On November 17—one week later—Mr. McKean's renomination to the nine-year post was approved by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee. Mr. Meese told the Independent Counsel that he assumed that "Mr. McKean's name later came up at a Senior Staff Personnel Committee meeting, and that he supported the nomination. . . ." (135)

Interest on the McKean loans to Mr. Meese continued to accrue, totalling $20,100 by June 1983. In September, two months after a story appeared in The Washington Post which linked the McKean loan to Mr. McKean's appointments, Mr. Meese secured a bank loan for $80,000 to pay off his loan from Mr. McKean. In February 1984—just before the Senate hearings on Mr. Meese's nomination for Attorney General began—Mr. Meese sent Mr. McKean a check for the remaining $3,340 interest due Mr. McKean.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The Independent Counsel concluded that the above facts would not support the bringing of a criminal prosecution against Mr. Meese, chiefly because there was no evidence that "Mr. Meese solicited a loan from Mr. McKean with the express or implied intention of assisting him in obtaining a government position, or that Mr. McKean offered to arrange a loan in the expectation or understanding that Mr. Meese would so assist him." (145) We do not and need not challenge that conclusion. The undisputed facts stated by the Independent Counsel show that Mr. Meese violated not only the most elementary ethical standards but also Executive Order 11222.

A high public official must not accept personal financial favors. A high public official must not give or appear to give government positions in actual or apparent return for favors done for government officials, whether for the appointing officer or for one of his friends. Such conduct is ethically wrong, even if there is no criminal bargain for a quid pro quo.

Mr. Meese did accept very substantial favors from Mr. McKean, both in the unsecured loan with "interest due not less than annually" that Mr. McKean arranged and also in the foregoing of interest. Mr. Meese did join with Mr. Deaver in supporting the first appointment of Mr. McKean, knowing that he had received financial favors from Mr. McKean. Subsequently, when Mr. Meese was further indebted to Mr. McKean, he joined in approving a second appointment for Mr. McKean. This was plainly wrong and a clear violation of ethical standards. Supporting the appointments also violated a regulation specifically applicable to White House employees, directing that "each employee avoid becoming involved in situations which present . . . the appearance that his official position might [have been] used to his private advantage."

2. The relationship, if any, of Thomas Barrack's role in the sale of the Meeses' California home and his appointment to federal jobs.

Allegations: In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "In August 1982, Thomas J. Barrack, Jr., an attorney and real estate developer, assisted the Meeses in the sale of their La Mesa property. In mid-November 1982, Mr. Barrack accepted a non-Presidential appointment as Deputy Undersecretary of Interior. Shortly thereafter, he was offered and accepted a position as Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Trade Development, but later declined the position and left the government.

"It has been alleged that a connection existed between Mr. Barrack's federal appointments and his involvement, especially his financial involvement, in the sale of the Meeses' La Mesa house." (151)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: As of August 1982, the Meeses had been trying unsuccessfully to sell their La Mesa home for more than a year-and-one-half, a state of affairs causing them serious financial problems. The Meeses had failed to make payments on their California and Virginia houses for substantial periods and their Bank had mentioned the possibility of foreclosure on their California property. On August 8, 1982, Pendleton James, who had recently been Director of the Office of Presidential Personnel and was a friend of the Meeses, called his friend Thomas Barrack—with whom Mr. James had been discussing possible federal employment—to seek his assistance in selling the La Mesa property.

Mr. Barrack had never met Ed Meese, but after speaking by phone with Mr. Meese at least twice in early August, Mr. Barrack began arranging a complicated sale of the Meeses' California home involving Irv Howard, a builder who had worked with Mr. Barrack, and Ted Elkin, a close personal friend of Mr. Barrack and his "right hand man." On August 18, 1982, only 10 days after the first phone call, Mr. Barrack and Mr. Meese agreed on a purchase price of $300,000. Both the Howards and Meeses signed escrow instructions for the property. Mr. Howard had not yet seen the property.

A few days later, the Great American Bank notified Mr. Meese's representative on the sale that more money was needed to cover the four loans to Mr. Meese which had been secured by the property as well as other payments due on his Virginia house. Mr. Barrack was informed that an additional $7,500 was necessary to complete the deal. At the same time the Bank informed Mr. Barrack that it would provide the buyer with more favorable financing terms than previously offered. Irv Howard agreed to the higher price with the new financing offered by the Great American Bank.

Mr. Barrack loaned his assistant Mr. Elkin $70,000 to be used toward the down payment. Shortly after September 1, 1982, the day of the closing, Mr. Elkin reimbursed Mr. Howard with Mr. Barrack's money for the down payment Mr. Howard had made. Mr. Howard made only one payment on the mortgage, after which Mr. Elkin—with money supplied by Mr. Barrack—took over the mortgage payments. A few months later, Mr. Barrack cancelled the note for $70,000 to Mr. Elkin, making Mr. Elkin a gift of the money.

One week after the closing of the La Mesa home, Pendleton James arranged for Mr. Barrack to meet with several members of the White House Personnel Office. On this occasion Mr. Barrack also met Mr. Meese face to face for the first time. After the meeting, Mr. Barrack wrote Mr. Meese a note which concluded: "Again, I am very grateful for your counsel and encouragement and if I may be of any aid or assistance please call on me." (210) Mr. Meese did not recall what they discussed Mr. Barrack told the Independent Counsel that the "counsel and encouragement" reference in the note was likely referring to his having told Mr. Meese about his possible relocation to New York City, something he said he was considering besides government service.

The next month, Mr. James arranged for Mr. Barrack to explore possible high-level government positions with five cabinet secretaries, each of whom received a letter from Mr. James which said, "I should mention that Ed Meese knows Tom and I'm sure also would endorse my strong support." (212) Mr. James sent a copy of this letter to Mr. Meese, asking, "Is there anybody else you think Tom should see when he is in Washington?" Mr. Meese did not recall the letter.

According to the Independent Counsel's Report:

"Mr. Meese stated that he could not recall when he learned that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position. He recalled that in August 1982, Mr. James told him that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James 'had tried' to recruit into the administration. However, Mr. Meese did not recall knowing that Mr. James was still engaged in such an effort. Mr. Meese told us that he might have known as early as the November 9, 1982 dinner [a dinner with Mr. Barrack that occurred the same day that Mr. Barrack interviewed with Transportation Secretary Lewis and HUD Secretary Pierce, and the day before he was to interview with Interior Secretary Watt and Energy Secretary Hodel], although he recalled no conversation about it. He thought he probably knew at Thanksgiving that Mr. Barrack was going to work for Secretary Watt." (200)

On December 1, 1982, Mr. Barrack began work as Deputy Undersecretary of Interior. One month later, according to the Report,

"In January 1983, Mr. Barrack told Secretary Watt that he had done what he could for the Secretary on his personal staff, and that it made no sense for him to continue there . . . . Commerce Secretary Baldrige had an Assistant Secretary position open and recruited Barrack, with Secretary Watt's blessing, to go to Commerce." (220-1)

Concerning Mr. Meese's role in Mr. Barrack's selection for the Commerce Department position, Mr. Meese told the Independent Counsel that "he assumed he raised no objection to this appointment . . . ." (222)

In May 1983, eight months after the purchase, Mr. Elkin sold the La Mesa property for $275,000, more than $30,000 below its purchase price. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, "Mr. Barrack contributed, through Mr. Elkin, approximately $83,000 in connection with the house—$70,000 for the down payment and initial expenses and $13,000 for mortgage payments and other expenses." (203)

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Here again, the facts found by the Independent Counsel reveal clear insensitivity to the ethical standards required of a nominee for Attorney General. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. James had requested Mr. Barrack to help Mr. Meese in connection with the sale of his California house at a time when he (Mr. Meese) was in financial difficulty. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. Barrack rendered him important assistance in the sale. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James "had tried" to recruit into the Administration. Mr. Meese had a copy of a letter from Mr. James telling him that he (Mr. James) was pushing Mr. Barrack for an important government appointment and giving Mr. Meese as a reference. Mr. Meese met Mr. Barrack twice in the fall while Mr. Barrack was in Washington, D.C. interviewing for federal employment. It is hard to see how Mr. Meese could have missed or not inquired about Mr. Barrack's interest in a government position.

Later, Mr. Meese, knowing that he had received substantial benefits from Mr. Barrack's efforts on his behalf, joined in approving the latter's appointment for a sub-Cabinet position. The Independent Counsel did not recommend prosecution because "there was no direct evidence that Mr. Meese's non-veto of Mr. Barrack's appointment to this job was based upon his earlier receipt of assistance from Mr. Barrack. . . ." (225) But here again Mr. Meese apparently did not reveal the conflict between his self-interest as the beneficiary of Mr. Barrack's assistance and his own duty as Counsellor to the President to see that government appointments were made uninfluenced by personal gratitude for financial assistance or other personal considerations. Nor did Mr. Meese recognize either the obvious risk he was creating of appearance of impropriety or the dangerous example he was setting for others by participating in the appointment of a man who had given him assistance in arranging the sale of his house when he was badly in debt. The public interest is bound to suffer unless the Attorney General is quicker to perceive the ethical violation in such interconnected dealings, even when there is no quid pro quo.

3. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

Allegations: According to the Report: "In July 1981, Mr. Meese's status in the U.S. Army Reserve was changed from Retired to Active. In early 1983, he received a promotion from Lieutenant Colonel to Colonel in the Reserve. In the spring of 1983, allegations appeared in the news media suggesting improprieties with respect to these actions, and suggesting that they somehow were linked to the nomination of General William Berkman in January 1983 to a second four-year term as Chief, Army Reserve." (254)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: In June 1981, Mr. Meese addressed the annual meeting of an army group. General William Berkman, Chief of Army Reserve, and Colonel Joseph Sullivan, General Berkman's program and liaison officer—and a long-time acquaintance of Mr. Meese—were both in attendance. A conversation between Mr. Meese and Colonel Sullivan brought out the fact that Mr. Meese was interested in returning to Active status in the Army Reserve. Thereafter Colonel Sullivan initiated actions leading to Mr. Meese's transfer to the Active Reserve. An Army Inspector General's Report issued in 1983 concluded that applicable laws and regulations were misapplied, violated or ignored in changing Mr. Meese's status. (Although not stated in the Independent Counsel's Report, the Inspector General's Report shows that the irregularities included the creation of a position especially for Mr. Meese.)

Colonel Sullivan was also the moving force in obtaining Mr. Meese's promotion to Colonel. Because Mr. Meese did not meet the educational requirements for promotion, the Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, Lieutenant General Max Thurman, wrote a memorandum analyzing whether constructive education credit could be granted to Mr. Meese. In the memorandum dated November 1, 1982, General Thurman pointed out that such credit could be authorized jointly by General Berkman and the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, but he advised against doing so that year. He outlined three approaches that could be taken. The first was to get constructive credit expeditiously for Mr. Meese. The second was to identify other individuals who might qualify for constructive credit so that Mr. Meese would not appear to be unique. And the third was to wait until the following year and pursue constructive credit in the "normal fashion." General Thurman recommended waiting so that "constructive credit for Mr. Meese could be accomplished as part of 'an orderly piece of work,' and a 'regular and normal affair.'" (267)

General Thurman showed this memorandum to General Berkman and told him that he recommended against giving constructive credit at this time "because of the risk that the matter would become publicly known, and would give the appearance of preferential treatment to Mr. Meese." (267)

Secretary of the Army Marsh was sent the memorandum and, according to his testimony, he sent it to Mr. Meese. Secretary Marsh also testified that when he called Mr. Meese about the Thurman memorandum, Mr. Meese said that he intended to take no position and wanted to stay out of the matter. Mr. Meese said that he did not recall the memorandum. Mr. Meese also could not recall speaking to Secretary Marsh on this subject; he could recall speaking about constructive credit with only Colonel Sullivan.

Despite the Thurman memorandum's adverse recommendation and General Thurman's statement to General Berkman that giving Mr. Meese constructive credit, if publicly known, would give the appearance of preferential treatment, within a few days General Berkman approved the constructive credit for Mr. Meese, with Colonel Sullivan hand-carrying the request document to General Berkman for approval. General

Berkman then hand-carried it to Admiral Narmi, the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, who also approved it. Mr. Meese was later promoted to Colonel. (Although not stated by the Independent Counsel's Report, Mr. Meese retired from the active reserve in March 1984—several months after the Inspector General's Report concluded that his return to active duty violated the regulations—but he retained his Colonelcy and the attendant higher pension benefits.)

Around the end of October, General Berkman, whose tour of duty as Army Reserve Chief was expiring in June 1983, indicated his interest in a second term. Sometime after November 1—at about the same time that the constructive credit necessary for Mr. Meese's promotion was granted—Mr. Meese spoke with Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and Army Secretary John Marsh to recommend General Berkman for another term. By mid-December, a decision had been reached to reappoint the General. Mr. Weinberger told Mr. Stein he remembers that Mr. Meese called to recommend that General Berkman be considered for appointment to a second term as Reserve chief. Mr. Meese says he also put in a good word for General Berkman with Army Secretary Marsh. Although General Berkman had been Mr. Meese's Reserve commander more than five years earlier, the relationship between them, according to the Stein report, was "limited and professionally based."

Mr. Meese told Mr. Stein's investigators he recommended General Berkman because he had heard from Reserve officials that General Berkman was doing a good job, it was his impression that the Army Reserve had been enhanced under General Berkman and General Berkman had impressed him in a speech he gave. But the Stein report says Mr. Meese "could not recall the identities of . . . [the Reserve officials] or the date of the conversation." Among the factors the Independent Counsel concluded may have played a role in General Berkman's reappointment was the telephone call from Mr. Meese to Secretary Weinberger supporting General Berkman.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The Independent Counsel "found no direct evidence that Mr. Meese took action favorable to General Berkman in return for something done for Mr. Meese by General Berkman. . . ." (280) Again, we do not challenge the Independent Counsel's conclusion. Nonetheless, Mr. Meese—indifferent to the appearance of exchanging his government influence for private gain—went out of his way to support General Berkman's reappointment, during the period when he was seeking a promotion under General Berkman's command.

In addition, these central facts remain: The Secretary of the Army states he telephoned Mr. Meese to call his attention to a memorandum advising against offering constructive credit to Mr. Meese at that time. Instead the memorandum recommended waiting until the following year so that the constructive credit would be part of "an orderly piece of work," and a "regular and normal affair." Nonetheless Mr. Meese allowed others to press his cause and was content to accept the military promotion appearing to result from his White House position.

4. The relationships, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. Meese and the appointment of Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, and Clarence Pendleton.

Allegations: The Great American First Savings Bank (Great American) made three loans to the Meeses in 1981 and 1982. Four officials of Great American received Presidential appointments in the Reagan Administration. In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "Questions have been raised as to whether there was any connection between the willingness of Great American to grant these loans to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointments of its officials to federal positions. Questions have also been raised as to whether the willingness of the Bank to forego timely payments played any role in the appointments." (150)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: Prior to President Reagan's election in 1980, the Meeses had two loans from Great American, totalling $120,000, which were secured by the first two deeds of trust on their La Mesa, California home. Mr. Meese noted that when he purchased his La Mesa home, "he went directly to Great American for financial assistance in the purchase of his house, since four officers of the Bank at the time—Messrs. Luce, Schmidt [the person Mr. Meese primarily dealt with on his loans], Sandstrom and Gray—had all served with him in the Reagan [California] administration." (152-3)

In January 1981, Mr. Meese telephoned Edwin Gray, who had been Vice President and Director of Public Affairs at Great American prior to 1980, to offer him a position as Deputy Assistant to the President, which he accepted. Mr. Gray had previously expressed an interest in a White House position. In early 1983, he was appointed Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, with Mr. Meese's strong support.

Mr. Meese obtained a third (bridge) loan from Great American in February 1981 for $132,000, secured by a third deed of trust on his California home. This was to cover the down payment on his new Virginia home and other related expenses.

Also in February 1981, Great American made a fourth loan to Mr. Meese, secured by a first deed of trust on the Virginia home, for $150,000. The total debt was now $402,000. In anticipation of an early sale of the California home, the Bank decided to defer for a "reasonable period" payments due on the notes secured by the first and second deeds of trust on the La Mesa property. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, the Bank had accorded such deferments to other customers.

On June 18, 1981, Gordon Luce, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of Great American, was named to the President's Commission on Housing. He was approved by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, of which Mr. Meese was a member. In the fall of 1982 Mr. Luce was appointed an Alternate Delegate to the United Nations General Assembly, with the approval of Mr. Meese and other Senior Staff Committee members.

On October 14, 1981, Mr. Meese, as a member of the Senior Staff Committee, approved Marc Sandstrom, the Bank's Executive Vice President and General Counsel, to be a recess appointee to the Board of Directors of the Legal Services Corporation. A few months later Mr. Sandstrom was formally nominated to the Board.

Around the same time, Clarence Pendleton, a member of the Bank's Board of Directors, was nominated to be Chairman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, a position he assumed several months later. Mr. Meese had supported his nomination, but said he was unaware of Mr. Pendleton's affiliation with Great American.

In 1982, Great American began trying to obtain payments (which it had deferred) on the first two loans secured by the Meese's house in La Mesa. In February 1982, Mr. McHenry, the manager of Great American's loan servicing department, informed Mr. Meese by letter that he owed $11,499.84. Mr. Meese did not respond to the letter.

Because the third (bridge) loan secured by the La Mesa house, which was due in full in February 1982, also had not been repaid, the bank decided to modify its agreement with Mr. Meese, extending the original note. Repeated requests by the Bank in February, March and April to sign a Modification Agreement extending the loan until June went unanswered. Then, later in April, the Bank decided to extend the bridge loan until August and provide a fourth loan of $21,000 to cover overdue payments on both the Virginia and California properties and to be secured by a fourth deed on the La Mesa property. In May the Meeses accepted the extension on their third loan and the additional loan.

"On June 17, 1982, Mr. McHenry wrote to Mr. Meese demanding payment and, for the first time, mentioning the possibility of foreclosure. He received no response." (166) Aside from the additional loan made by Great American to cover past payments due, Mr. Meese had failed to make mortgage payments on his two homes from February until September, when his California home was sold.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The independent Counsel concluded that "despite the various degrees of support Mr. Meese gave to the appointments of Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom and Pendleton, the evidence does not warrant the finding that such support was connected to the Bank's treatment of the Meeses." (185) The Independent Counsel's Report "found no evidence that Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom and Pendleton were involved materially, if at all, in the Meeses' financial dealings with the Bank." Nonetheless, the ethical violation is clear: Mr. Meese participated in decisions to recommend individuals who he knew were high officials of Great American First Savings Bank for government appointments at a time when he had borrowed several hundred thousand dollars from the Bank on favorable terms, including forbearance of monthly payments on some of his loans, and in fact was in default on one of his loans.

5. The relationship, if any, of a $15,000 loan made to Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas to federal jobs, as well as Mr. Meese's failure to include in this Financial Disclosure Statements the $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese.

Allegations: In the words of the Report: "On January 7, 1981, Edwin W. Thomas [a friend of the Meeses] lent $15,000 to Ursula Meese. Mrs. Meese used the money to purchase stock in Biotech Capital Corporation on behalf of two of her children. It has been alleged that there was a connection between the loan and federal appointments obtained by members of the Thomas family.

"Questions have also been raised regarding Mr. Meese's failure to report the $15,000 on his Financial Disclosure Form (SF 278) filed February 19, 1981 . . . or on the forms he filed in May 1982 . . . and May 1983 . . . although the loan was partially unpaid until June 1983 . . . ." (24)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: On January 7, 1981, just before

President Reagan took office, Edwin Thomas, a close friend of the Meeses, loaned Mrs. Meese $15,000 to buy stock in Biotech Capital Corporation, a company headed by a close friend of Mr. Thomas. Mr. Meese recalled discussing the Thomas loan proposal with his wife, and approving the idea, probably in December 1980. Mr. Meese thought he probably offered Mr. Thomas the job as Assistant Counsellor to the President, also in December 1980. Mr. Meese said he knew as early as election day what role he would play in the new Administration and "never doubted that he wanted Mr. Thomas to be his assistant." (53) In late January, Mr. Thomas began working as Assistant Counsellor to the President, a position he held until February 1982, when he was appointed Adminstrator of the San Francisco Regional Office of the General Service Administration. (In the fall of 1982, Mr. Thomas' wife became an attorney-examiner with the Merit Systems Protection Board and his son took a job with the Department of Labor.)

After taking the position of Counsellor to the President, Mr. Meese filed financial disclosure reports, as required under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. His first report, the draft for which he prepared himself, was filed in February 1981, six weeks after Mrs. Meese received the $15,000 loan from Mr. Thomas. Although the Act clearly requires disclosure of liabilities in excess of $10,000, neither this statement nor Mr. Meese's subsequent statements listed the loan as a liability.

Explaining his omission, "Mr. Meese told members of his staff and others at the White House that it had never occurred to him or 'registered' in his mind that a loan such as this was the kind of thing he was required to include on an SF 278." (75) Moreover, the Report characterizes Mr. Meese as showing a "lack of attention" to his Financial Disclosure Forms.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Independent Counsel found "no direct evidence linking the offer of the loan, or the subsequent making of the loan, to Mr. Meese's offer of a job to Mr. Thomas." (72) Whatever his subjective motive, Mr. Messe did link by his actions the receipt by his wife of an undisclosed financial favor and the giving of a government job to the man who had done the favor. Surely—in the words of Executive Order 11222—he became involved in a situation that presented the appearance of "losing complete independence or impartiality."

Not only does his conduct reflect marked indifference to ethical standards, but the Independent Counsel's discussion of Mr. Meese's failure to list the $15,000 loan from Mr. Thomas also shows his to be ignorant of a basic legal and ethical obligation of public officials.[2]

6. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust.

Allegations: Questions were raised regarding whether Mr. Meese's acceptance of payments from the Presidential Transition Trust was lawful.

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: The Presidential Transition Trust was established in August 1980 to raise money to fund the Reagan/Bush Planning Task Force, a group intended to engage in "pre-transition" activities such as identifying government positions to be filled. After the election, when the Trust was terminating, some funds remained in its treasury. With this remaining money, checks were distributed to several persons soon to be members of the Administration, including $10,000 to Mr. Meese clearly designated for "moving expenses." Mr. Meese deposited his check in his bank account on November 22, 1980.

In early December, according to Mr. McPherson, counsel to the Trust, Mr. Meese said that money was needed to pay the moving expenses of the people coming from California to Washington to work in the Administration. After Mr. McPherson learned that this might constitute a legal problem, he informed Mr. Meese, who agreed with him that the matter should be discussed with the Justice Department. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, Mr. McPherson explained that—

"[He] received the oral opinion . . . that [the Justice Department] would probably consider payment of "moving expenses" by the Trust to prospective government employees to be a violation of 18 U.S.C § 209(a), a criminal statute barring payment or acceptance by any person of "supplementation of his salary as a government employee." [footnote omitted] Mr. McPherson said he reported this to Mr. Meese during December of 1980. Mr. Meese told Mr. McPherson not to pursue the matter further. At no time did Mr. Meese tell Mr. McPherson that he had received a check from the Trust for moving expenses in November and he had deposited it in his account on November 22, 1980." (344-5)

Mr. Meese said that he had no recollection of these conversations, but that he had learned from a source whom he couldn't recall that there might be "a problem" and asked "someone, probably Mrs. von Damm" (the office manager who later became White House Personnel Director) at the Trust to change trust records to reflect that his check was for "consulting fees," which he reported as income on his tax return and Financial Disclosure Form.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Independent Counsel concluded that a criminal violation could not be established. We do not dispute this. But there is something disquieting about Mr. Meese's conduct when viewed in the light of Mr. Meese's insensitivity to ethical standards in other situations affecting his finances. Would a man sensitive to ethical standards who had received a $10,000 payment that he learned was "probably illegal" be content to keep the money and simply have the record changed to read "consulting fees?" Mr. Meese may have earned consulting fees. But surely in this difficult situation, an honorable man would want to return the money, submit a statement of the hours spent in consultation, and then obtain payment of his fee.

MR. MEESE'S FAILURE TO RECALL SIGNIFICANT EVENTS, CONVERSATIONS AND DOCUMENTS

One of the striking features of the Independent Counsel's Report is the extent to which Mr. Meese claims to be unable to remember significant events or actions. The Independent Counsel's Report reflects a man who is not merely occasionally forgetful, but rather, if taken at his word, suffers from frequent lapses of memory concerning conversations, documents and events bearing upon the integrity of his conduct.

1. In connection with the charges involving Mr. McKean it was important to know to what extent Mr. Meese was aware of Mr. McKean's interest in a government position. When asked questions about documents, conversations or events that would indicate he was aware of this, Mr. Meese answered that he could not recall.

"Mr. McKean recalled telling Mr. Meese that he had learned that his appointment was going through and said words to the effect, 'I appreciate any role you've played in this.' Mr. Meese did not recall this conversation, although he thought it probably occurred." (127)

"In a letter from Mr. McKean to Mr. Meese dated September 14, 1982, Mr. McKean expressed his interest in the longer term on the Postal Board, and said, 'With your help I can continue this [work].' When confronted with this evidence of his knowledge, Mr. Meese said that he did not recall receiving the letter." (133)

"According to the Independent Counsel's Report, 'Mr. Meese assumed that Mr. McKean's name later came up at a Senior Staff Personnel Committee meeting, and that he supported the nomination, but he had no recollection of this occurring.' "(135)

2. In connection with the charges involving Mr. Barrack, it was important to know to what extent Mr. Meese was aware of Mr. Barrack's efforts to secure a government position. When asked questions about documents or conversations that would indicate he was aware of this, Mr. Meese repeatedly answered he could not recall.

"According to the Independent Counsel's Report: 'Mr. Meese had no recollection of Mr. Barrack's September 8 visit to his office [their first meeting occurring one week after the sale of Mr. Meese's home] until he found and reviewed the letter in his files. He did not recall what was discussed, or whether anyone else was present. He also did not recall if he knew Mr. Barrack had been interviewed by people in OPP [the Office of Presidential Personnel].' " (210)

"In a letter to several cabinet secretaries asking them to see Mr. Barrack, Mr. James wrote: 'I should mention that Ed Meese knows Tom and I'm sure also would endorse my strong support.' Mr. James sent a copy of the letter to Mr. Meese. According to the Report: 'Mr. Meese did not recall the October 27 letter. He also did not recall knowing at this time that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position, or that Mr. James was seeking to obtain one for him.' (214) He explained that he sometimes but now always read the contents of his 'reading file' where a copy of the letter would have gone and that other staff read and filed the original."

"According to the Report: 'Mr. Meese stated that he could not recall when he learned that Mr. Barrack was interestred in a federal position. He recalled that in August 1982, Mr. James told him that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James "had tried" to recruit into the administration. However, Mr. Meese did not recall knowing that Mr. James was still engaged in such an effort. Mr. Meese told us that he might have know as early as the November 9, 1982 dinner [a dinner with Mr. Barrack that occurred the same day that Mr. Barrack interviewed with Transportation Secretary Lewis and HUD Secretary Pierce, and the day before he was to interview Interior Secretary Watt and Energy Secretary Hodel], although he recalled no conversation about it. He thought he probably knew at Thanksgiving that Mr.

[2] The Independent Counsel's Report documents numerous other examples of Mr. Meese's failure to comply with the financial disclosure requirements of the Ethics in Government Act. The Report notes that during his first four years in office, Mr. Meese initially failed to list at least 20 items on the Financial Disclosure Forms he was required by law to complete.

Barrack was going to work for Secretary Watt.' " (220)

According to the Report: "Concerning his Senior Staff role in [Mr. Barrack's appointment to the Assistant Secretary of the Commerce Department] Mr. Meese said that he assumed he raised no objection to this appointment, but that he had no recollection of the matter.' " (222)

3. In connection with the charges involving Mr. Meese's Army Reserve status, it was important to know the extent to which Mr. Meese was aware that he could be receiving special treatment on his promotion and to know what his grounds were for favoring the reappointment of General Berkman. When asked questions about special treatment and the reappointment of General Berkman, Mr. Meese answered that he could not recall.

"Secretary of the Army Marsh, who recalled sending General Thurman's memorandum to Mr. Meese and later calling Mr. Meese about it, recalled that Mr. Meese simply wanted to take no position on it. However, 'Mr. Meese had no recollection of receiving the memorandum. When he reviewed the original copy, which we had obtained, it did not refresh his recollection.' (269) Mr. Meese also could not recall speaking to Secretary Marsh on this subject, stating that the only person he could recall talking to was Colonel Sullivan."

"Mr. Meese spoke with Secretaries Weinberger and Marsh to recommend General Berkman. Mr. Meese explained that he supported General Berkman in part because of recommendations of several Reserve officials. However, 'Mr. Meese could not recall the identities of these individuals, or the date of the conversation.' " (275)

The Independent Counsel apparently regarded Mr. Meese's repeated lapses of memory concerning transactions of questionable ethical propriety as unimportant in deciding whether to seek an indictment, the truth of which would have to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. In contexts other than a criminal investigation one might well be warranted in drawing adverse inferences from such repeated inability to answer key questions. But even if no adverse inference should be drawn about Mr. Meese's credibility, the lapses of memory surely confirm the charge of insensitivity to the ethical standards that apply to a Presidential Counsellor and future Attorney General. That a man with Mr. Meese's public responsibilities may neglect some of his personal affairs is readily imaginable. That a man as busy as Mr. Meese may forget incidents seemingly unimportant at the time they occur in the course of his duties is also obvious. But anyone who is truly sensitive to ethical concerns immediately becomes alert and does remember, when names are mentioned or proposals are made that suggest the danger of mixing of personal affairs with public duties, conflicts of interest, or other improprieties.

A man whose sense of propriety forbade his receiving preferential treatment in a military promotion because of his being a Presidential Counsellor, would unquestionably recall a warning telephone call from the Secretary of the Army. He would come alert, and not forget, when the name of the man (Barrack) who arranged the sale of his house came up for appointment to the sub-Cabinet. Likewise, one with appreciation of the impropriety of appointing one's creditor (McKean) to office would come alert and remember when the name of the individual who had arranged a $60,000 loan came up for appointment before a government committee of which he was a member. He would remember a letter from that man asking him for help in obtaining the appointment—if he had any sense of the impropriety of the request and the potential embarrassment if he had a hand in the appointment. Perhaps a man sensitive to ethical standards might forget once, but not on repeated occasions.

In short, even accepting the honesty and candor of Mr. Meese's statements of forgetfulness, they confirm the other evidence of unawareness of, or indifference to, ethical standards required of public officials.

CONCLUSION

We do not suggest that Mr. Meese should be denied confirmation simply because he made mistakes. We do submit that Mr. Meese's actions, though not determined to be criminal, do reveal that he is unfit to be Attorney General.

Confidence in the fairness and impartiality of the administration of justice is essential to a free government. Those who enforce the law must be free from personal interest. The Attorney General must be a symbol of these qualities, not only for the country but for other lawyers in the Department of Justice. Mr. Meese's record of violations of Executive Order 11222, applicable regulations and general standards of ethical conduct makes it impossible for him to be that symbol. He has accepted a promotion that gives the appearance of receiving preferential treatment after being alerted to the problem by the Secretary of the Army. He has failed to understand the wrong in approving for public office persons from whom he has accepted financial assistance. He has displayed an ignorance of the requirements of financial disclosure totally inconsistent with their purpose of revealing conflicts of interest.

An Attorney General can do more to set the ethical tone of an Administration than any other member of the Cabinet. Mr. Meese cannot now perform that function. How could Mr. Meese show by example or tell others that it is wrong to assist individuals in obtaining public office who have done one financial favors, or to accept financial aid or favors from government contractors or their officials, or to accept other preferential treatment?

The Department of Justice has the initial responsibility for investigating charges of wrongdoing against high government officials. Suppose that it were to develop, while Mr. Meese was Attorney General, that on numerous occasions some high official in the White House had supported individuals outside the government for important government positions after he had received unusual financial assistance from them or the organizations in which they held leadership positions. Could Mr. Meese, who has himself been the recipient of such favors, and participated in such appointments, be expected to press a vigorous investigation? Would a young lawyer in the Department of Justice to whom the allegations were referred recommend further investigation knowing that the Attorney General had been in just such a position?

Not infrequently the Department of Justice has the responsibility for investigating gifts made to government officials by government contractors. Could Mr. Meese be expected to see anything wrong in such conduct?

From time to time, attorneys of the Department of Justice are requested to do favors for friends, for political benefactors of an Administration, and for others in positions of influence. Often they have to choose between following high professional standards in the conduct of an investigation or litigation and resorting to unworthy tactics in order to prevail. No one can have confidence that Mr. Meese's example would steer them in the right direction.

In the end the question is very simple. The Independent Counsel did not charge Mr. Meese with a crime. Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official. He should not be confirmed as Attorney General.

GENOCIDE: MANIFESTATION OF MORAL DISEASE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the following passage is excerpted from William Styron's book, "Sophie's Choice":

The Russians were coming and the SS wanted the children destroyed. Most of them were Polish; the Jewish children were already dead. They thought of burning them alive in a pit, or shooting them, but they decided to do something that wouldn't show too many marks and evidence. So in the freezing cold they marched the children down to the river and made them take off their clothes and soak them in the water as if they were washing them, and then made them put on these wet clothes again. Then they marched them back to the area in front of the barracks where they had been living and had a role call. Standing in their wet clothes. The roll call lasted for many, many hours while the children stood wet and freezing and night came. All of the children died of being exposed that day. They died of exposure and pneumonia, very fast.

These words were spoken by the heroine, Sophie, who never knew whether her son was among those massacred children—or if he had been murdered sooner.

Styron makes the articulate analogy of the Nazis to a deadly virus: he writes, "on the level of human behavior, the Nazi phenomenon was analogous to a huge and crucial colony of cells going morally berserk, creating the same kind of danger to the body of humanity as does a virulently malignant tumor in a single human body."

We are reminded that Hitler, Stalin, and Idi Amin, however sick, were human beings. And they were human enough to attain great, great power. I view the Genocide Treaty as a vaccine. Maybe the moral aims of the convention can help to contain the spiritual disease which results in genocide.

The Senate is in the position of a medic in the Peace Corps. We cannot walk away from a world which needs our support.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am advised that my time was reserved by the distinguished majority leader. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. If the time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired, may I reclaim that time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

JOHN A. KNAUSS—A RECORD OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today Dr. John A. Knauss steps down as Chairman of the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere, concluding an extended term of exceptional service to the Congress and to the Nation.

The National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere [NACOA] is charged with the responsibility of providing expert advice to the Congress and to the President on programs and policies to promote our knowledge, wise use, and stewardship of ocean and atmosphere resources and environment. John Knauss has provided leadership for NACOA for a longer period than any person in the history of the advisory committee, and under his leadership NAOCA has compiled an exceptional and productive record of carefully researched policy guidance and recommendations for the consideration of the executive branch and the Congress.

I am proud to claim John Knauss both as a Rhode Islander and a friend. John, as dean of the Graduate School of Oceanography at the University of Rhode Island and later as the provost and vice president for marine affairs at URI, has been primarily responsible for the development of URI as one of the Nation's leading oceanographic institutions.

John was first appointed as a member of NACOA in 1977, and after serving as vice chairman and acting chairman was appointed as chairman by President Reagan for a 3-year term.

As John Knauss himself has observed, the work of advisory committees is often frustrating to both the advisor and the advisee. Even the best of advice is not always heeded. Nevertheless, under Chairman Knauss, NACOA has performed well the invaluable task of making known the potential advantages and disadvantages of alternate policy courses, the costs of either acting or not acting on problems and in evaluating new options in marine and atmospheric programs and policies.

I believe our Nation owes a debt of gratitude to John Knauss for his dedicated and excellent service and leadership.

Fortunately, John Knauss will continue to contribute his knowledge and judgment to the improvement of the marine sciences both in the United States and internationally, serving as chairman of the executive committee for the international Joint Oceanographic Institutions Deep Earth Sampling Program, and as chairman of the newly formed Marine Division of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges.

It should be noted that John Knauss' term as Chairman of NACOA ended on June 30, 1984, and that although ineligible by law for reappointment to the Advisory Committee, he has continued to serve as Chairman awaiting the appointment of a successor.

All who are concerned with the oceanic and atmospheric programs and policies of the country will miss John Knauss' guiding hand at NACOA, but I hope and expect that he will continue to give us the benefit of his counsel and wisdom in the coming years.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield my remaining time to the distinguished majority leader.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business. The majority leader is recognized.

AN IMPRESSIVE PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURAL CEREMONY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday, I touched very briefly on the outstanding accomplishments of the senior Senator from Maryland and his lovely wife, Ann, in having organized such an impressive Presidential inaugural ceremony.

Today, I would like to expand on my comments and pay tribute not only to Senator MATHIAS and Senator WENDELL FORD, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Senate Rules Committee, but also to commend the staff members who were so actively involved in the preparation of this historic event.

As we all recognize, it takes many months of organization to put together the finite details necessary to insure the success of an inaugural event of this magnitude. The executive director of the Joint Congressional Inaugual Committee, John Chambers, and his staff put their shoulders to the wheel and diligently composed a program to fit the occasion. But Mother Nature played her hand and dealt us cold weather that would have been dangerous to endure for the scheduled length of the program. When it became necessary to move the ceremony inside to the rotunda of the Capitol, Senator MATHIAS, Senator FORD, and John Chambers called the team together, and worked throughout the day and night to reorganize the program.

A special word of thanks for their dedicated efforts should go not only to these key players, but also to John Rixey and Glee Gomien of the Inaugural Committee staff, as well as Larry Smith, the Senate Sergeant at Arms. These competent individuals, together with Joe O'Leary, a volunteer former member of the Rules Committee staff, worked all day Sunday and all of Sunday night, and performed a superhuman task in moving the ceremony indoors. Also contributing to a major degree in this effort were John Childers and Gerry Gereau of the Rules Committee staff, Capitol Police Chief James Carvino, and Bill Ensign and Beverly "Buz" Hummer of the Architect's Office. And I understand that Tom Ward from the Architect's Office was the hero of the day.

The principal coordinator of the event, Army Col. Tom Groppel, and his staff were also major contributors to the success not only of the early organization phase, but in the reorganization effort as well.

It is also clear that our colleagues in the House had to be consulted for their advice as plans changed, and Speaker O'NEILL, Minority Leader BOB MICHEL, and Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT, made themselves available for consultation whenever the need arose.

The press coverage of any inauguration is always an important aspect to be considered, but it became all the more a key factor when it was realized that only a handful of individuals would be able to witness personally the administration of the oaths of office to President Reagan and Vice President BUSH. Max Barber and Larry Janezich of the Senate Radio-TV gallery responded promptly and efficiently to the call, and they too worked throughout the night to insure no detail was overlooked.

There were, of course, many others involved in the inaugural ceremony, including the Secret Service. But too often we fail to pay tribute to the individuals who support us with efficiency and dedication, and I would like to take this opportunity to give them the recognition they so richly deserve, and to thank them—one and all—for a job well done.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I think from time to time we should pause to acknowledge that the distinguished majority leader, the distinguished minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Maryland, the chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. MATHIAS], a committee of which I am a member, have all worked diligently to see that the Senate of the United States and its employees have served the American public over the last several days.

Mr. President, it was particularly important to me because so many people came from the Commonwealth of Virginia nearby to share in this historic moment.

Without exception, Mr. President, it was my observation that the security staff, those who were involved in food service, and all Senate employees accommodated these visitors from afar and near in a style that is commensurate with the best traditions of the U.S. Senate.

I, as one Senator, wish to express my appreciation to the leadership and all of those who made this historic period a very memorable one.

I thank the Chair.

TWELFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ROE VERSUS WADE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today, on the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court's Roe versus Wade decision, thousands of Americans are in our Nation's Capital restating a commitment to the most fundamental of governmental purposes: the protection of human life.

The thousands of participants in today's March for Life represent millions of Americans who share their conviction. More importantly, they represent the 1.6 million unborn children who will be victims of abortion in 1985 and the millions more who will be denied the right to life in the years to come unless we as a society act to protect them.

This year's march is especially significant in its timing. It comes at the beginning of the second term of a President committed to the protection of life. It comes at the beginning of a new Congress that is consumed by debate over the monstrous budget deficit, a debate that often is cast in terms of the deficit's effect on future generations.

I think that is an appropriate context for this debate. I worry about the burden our Nation's profligate spending will impose on our children and grandchildren, on future generations born and those who will never have the opportunity to live life outside the womb.

Let me cite one example. Since coming to the Senate in 1979, I have concentrated on the problems of our health care system. It is a system that we are just beginning to address with thoughtful, long-term policies. Until those policies take hold, we will continue to finance a system that takes funds away from health care to provide disproportionately for sick care.

We're taking money away from maternal and child health, nutrition, housing, recreation, and education just to feed this sick care system of ours. And what are we feeding? A system in which huge amounts of money go into very expensive neonatal intensive care beds because we have not put money into preventive care.

There are only a third as many neonatal intensive care beds in Oslo, Norway, as there are per capita in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul. We have three times as many beds in the Twin Cities because we have not recognized that the best incubator in the world is the womb. We have three times as many beds because we have to pay for mistakes that we do not have to make.

We do not have to tell the elderly to "get out of the way," as one Governor put it, and we do not have to deny the right to life to the unborn. We are a rich society that can afford an investment in health care as well as sick care. And, we are a compassionate society that must attach the highest value to our most precious gift: life.

Yet, our society remains confused about that precious gift. Questions of life—abortion, capital punishment, and euthanasia, to name just three—divide our Nation. In some cases, the debate goes beyond words, and that is deplorable. No cause, no amount of righteousness, no rationale warrants the threats to human life posed by the recent wave of bombings at medical clinics. That these bombings have taken place in the name of protecting life is all the more deplorable for the vast majority of pro-life advocates who are committed to a peaceful resolution of the issue.

It would be far better if some forum other than a political arena were available in which to resolve these questions of life. But the overwhelming importance of the issues and their divisiveness have forced them into the Halls of Congress and State legislatures. These questions of life, and abortion in particular, are not merely matters in which the right to privacy supersedes all other concerns. They are questions that strike at the heart of our society and must be settled by the political and legislative vehicles that govern our society.

We, the elected representatives of our society, have an obligation to reach a consensus on the question of abortion—a consensus structured on the paramount importance of life. We cannot tolerate the status quo, because that only guarantees confusion. Legislative and judicial bodies across the land have created a confused and often contradictory patchwork of policies. While some of the laws have been struck down by the Supreme Court and some of the judicial rulings may be overturned, they stand out as just a few of the many examples of the contradictions that must be resolved by Congress and the States working together.

In the same vein, this Congress has an obligation to assure appropriate funding for child welfare services, foster care and adoption services. Our children must not be on the front line in the battle to control the Federal budget. The same fervor we bring to protecting the unborn's right to life must be brought to funding programs that will provide the necessary health care for mother and child during pregnancy and the opportunity for quality of life after birth.

I sincerely hope that the 99th Congress will live up to these challenges.

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to join today in celebrating the 12th anniversary of the Roe versus Wade Supreme Court decision allowing women to choose to have an abortion. More often, some of my colleagues who opposed that decision have come to the Senate floor to denounce the right to choose to have an abortion. I, along with several prochoice colleagues, want to use this anniversary date to express my shock and concern with the escalating amount of violence and harassment directed at women exercising their constitutional right to choose whether or not to bear a child. In addition to the Senators I am joined by today, I hope that other Senators—regardless of their feelings about the subject of abortion—will condemn these illegal acts.

Twelve years ago, the highest court in the land clearly said that at least during the first trimester of pregnancy, a woman has the constitutional right to decide for herself without hindrance or help from anyone, including the Government, whether or not she wants to have an abortion. Some people who disagree with that decision have tried using the legal process to overturn Roe versus Wade. Using our democratic system is perfectly within their right. No doubt I will continue to spend many hours on the floor of the Senate debating my colleagues who have tried to pass constitutional amendments and other legislative initiatives to make abortion illegal or prohibit Federal funding of abortion. Our democracy is designed to accommodate this diversity of beliefs.

Yet some who do not agree with the Roe versus Wade decision have resorted to illegal and frightening tactics to impose their views on others. A quick glance at the 30 burnings and bombings at abortion clinics in 1984 reveals the gravity of this situation. Residents in my own State of Oregon have been unfortunate victims of attempted violence. Last year, there were two arson attempts and a death threat letter sent to a Forest Grove, OR, medical clinic that provides abortion services. Other abortion facilities in Oregon have experienced similar episodes.

I want to express my admiration for the brave women and men who work in abortion facilities across the country and as a result of their employment, live in fear every time they walk into the office. Many have been the victim of harassment in the privacy of their own residences. Many even live in fear for their children's safety because they have received death threats against their loved ones. I can understand the meaning of this fear because I was recently the victim of a death threat by an extremist group.

Illegal means to overturn legal rights will never be successful. We will never allow a minority to force their view of the world on the rest of us.

Mr. President, the danger to the liberties of all Americans is most threatened by those who want to compel conformity of thought and deed. Conversely, our liberties are most secured by a decent respect for diversity, and most especially on those subjects upon which there is no consensus.

God did not speak to any one of us and say, "You are right and those who disagree with you are wrong." If any one of us thinks that God has ordained us to speak for Him, we are wrong.

For, indeed, if I am right and you are wrong, then it is just a short step to the end justifies the means. And that philosophy means that the potential victims of the abortion clinic violence are not only those whose immediate safety is threatened. The very liberties of all Americans are at stake.●

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today is the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court decision in Roe against Wade, which gave women the right to choose whether to bear a child. Today, this fundamental and very personal right is under attack. The constitutional right to make childbearing decisions is vital to the realization of equality for 51 percent of our population. The dignity, the freedom, the health and well-being of over half of our population necessitates our commitment to preserving a woman's right to choose. A woman's decision to have an abortion is and must remain a private decision made in consultation with her physician.

Today, there are efforts being made to deny women this constitutional right to make childbearing decisions. I am talking about the organized picketing and harassment of women attempting to use family planning services. Such harassment has prevented some women from seeking family planning counseling and services, but not from seeking abortions. Let me mention, as an example, the case of a 17-year-old girl who came to a planned parenthood facility seeking family planning assistance. She was frightened off by the harassment of the picketers in front of the clinic and turned and went away. Six weeks later she was back for an abortion and, this time, the picketers did not deter her. The tactics of those opposed to abortion can encourage rather than discourage abortions. The constitutional and civil rights of women are violated when they have to face verbal abuse and barriers at the entrance to family planning clinics and when, once they are in those clinics, they are in danger of being killed or wounded by a bomb.

Let us today reaffirm our determination to take steps which lead to the arrest and prosecution to the fullest of those responsible for the bombings and the bomb threats which have brought fear into the lives of so many women.

The ability of women to realize their full capacity as human beings is linked to their right to make childbearing decisions. Equality for women demands that women have the right to make decisions regarding the size of their families based on emotional, economic, and physical considerations. Our Constitution provides women with this right. This struggle for equality for women has been long and is not yet complete. We cannot remedy the historic unequal treatment of women but we can and must defend the rights women have won.●

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, 12 years ago today, the U.S. Supreme Court issued Roe versus Wade, judicially securing the right to choose as a matter of fundamental constitutional law. Since Roe versus Wade, it has been against the law to interfere with a woman's right to make a decision about whether to bear a child.

As Roe versus Wade made clear, the right to choose is a fundamental right, based on each woman's right to privacy. Neither the Government nor any person has the right to infringe on that freedom.

Today, the right to choose is under renewed attack. In the past, individuals and organizations opposed to abortion have sought constitutional amendments and other legislative mechanisms to eliminate the right to choose. Now, organized campaigns of harassment and violence have been made part of the campaign against the right to choose. The methods chosen by these campaigns have ranged from picketing outside family planning services to bombing health care facilities whose services include providing abortions. The goal in all cases has been the same: to prevent women from exercising their right to choose.

It is shocking that those who profess to protect the rights of the unborn are willing to risk the rights of the born by bombing buildings, and it is also shocking and disappointing that some who oppose Roe versus Wade, find the use of terrorist acts justifiable as a means of seeking change.

Every citizen has the right to seek to change laws with which they disagree. Under our Constitution, we even have the right to change the Constitution. But no citizen has the right to use violence in order to prevent another citizen from exercising a constitutional right. Clinic bombings represent a complete disregard for our system of laws, indeed for our democracy itself.

The right to choose is the law of the United States. No person has the right to infringe on that freedom. Those of us who are in Government have a special responsibility to see to it that the United States continues to protect this right, as it must protect all rights secured by the Constitution.●

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, 12 years ago today, the Supreme Court issued a ruling which has resulted in the legalized destruction of over 16 million unborn children in America. The figure is so vast, the number of lives lost is so staggering, that it is hard to comprehend. Even more astounding than the fact that such a mass destruction of human life occurs, is that it is sanctioned by the U.S. Government.

Such was not always the case. Prior to the Supreme Court's ruling in Roe versus Wade, not one single State in the country had such an unrestricted abortion policy. Thirty-one States had statutes which prohibited abortion completely, with an exception for the life of the mother. Nineteen other States allowed abortion under very limited circumstances, such as pregnancy resulting from rape, incest, or when there was a likelihood that the child was going to be handicapped.

Even the State with the most liberal law on abortion—New York—allowed abortion-on-demand only through the first 6 months of pregnancy.

Undaunted by the consensus against abortion that existed at that time in the country, the Supreme Court, in one fell swoop, established abortion-on-demand as the law of the land. Many people do not understand that the Court did, in fact, legalize the taking of unborn life right up to the last month—even the last week—of pregnancy. But that is what the Roe versus Wade decision did. Regardless of how far advanced a woman may be in her pregnancy, if a woman can get a physician to agree that her life or health is endangered by the pending birth of the child, it is perfectly legal to abort the child. Health has been so broadly defined that it includes emotional or psychological well-being.

Significantly, the very first section of the Constitution of the United States reads. "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Nowhere in that section, or anywhere else in the Constitution, do I see legislative powers given to the Supreme Court of the United States. And yet, in the 1973 decision, the Supreme Court usurped the laws of the 50 States and the Constitution by decreeing the legality of abortion.

Proponents of legalized abortion will tell you that the Court did not legislate, but only protected a woman's consitutional right to an abortion. Not only is there no such right to be found in the Constitution, but the 14th amendment prohibits the very action they are calling a right. It says, "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. How much clearer can it be? Human life is not to be arbitrarily snuffed out, and equal protection is to be accorded to everyone.

To those who say that the unborn child is not a person and therefore not protected by the 14th amendment, I say poppycock. There is a saying, "You can fool all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time." Call the child what you like: fetus, POC [product of conception], or anything else, but everything within and without us affirms that an unborn child is a person. Ask the expectant woman who is awakened in the night by little kicks and squirms. Ask the couple who has watched their baby sucking its thumb with a sonogram. It all tells us what we already instinctively know, that life is a continum not to be broken off into persons and nonpersons.

And so, today I join the March for Life participants here in Washington, those people braving the 20 degree weather in protesting the killing of the most innocent and defenseless of our society. I commend them and all of the men and women in our country who stand against this atrocity. It has been said that "A great cause doesn't need great people, only tireless individuals." That certainly characterizes the prolife movement.

It is my hope that in the face of mounting scientific evidence and the continued unacceptability of abortion-on-demand to the American people, the Supreme Court will overturn itself. Three of the Justices are opposed to the Court's ruling, including Justice Sandra O'Connor, President Reagan's appointee. We know that the Constitution is clear, and, if interpreted correctly, would make legislation or constitutional amendments unnecessary. However, Congress may be forced to amend the Constitution to expressly deny a right which we know is not there anyway. Like those who fought slavery, overturning the Supreme Court with the passage and ratification of the 13th and 14th amendments, we are committed to seeing justice for all, born and unborn.

For the 16 million children who will never be, we stand and pledge our continued efforts. And, for the children of tomorrrow, we will work so that they will be given their most fundamental right, that of life itself.●

SENATOR WARNER RECOMMENDED TO BE OBSERVER AT NEGOTIATIONS IN GENEVA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, I have recommended to the President that Senator WARNER take the place of Senator GOLDWATER as an observer to the negotiations in Geneva. This recommendation is being submitted pursuant to the provisions of Senate Resolution 19 which passed the Senate unanimously on January 3, 1985.

MOROCCO'S EFFECTIVE COOPERATION CONTRIBUTES TO U.S. NARCOTIC CONTROL EFFORT

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, during the past 3 years, Morocco has initiated many important educational, law enforcement, and treatment programs aired at stopping hashish abuse and cultivation. These successful initiatives have had a positive impact on public health and safety in the United States as well as Morocco.

In 1984, there was a decrease in the amount of hashish entering our Nation and a consequent decrease in hashish abuse. While an estimated 150 metric tons of hashish were imported into the United States in 1983, this compares with over 200 metric tons in 1982, through Morocco's close cooperation with our Embassy in Rabat and Interpol, Moroccan hashish entering the United States has been reduced to 5 percent of the total. During this same period, seizure of Moroccan hashish and arrest of traffickers has increased sharply. This is a tribute to the courageous efforts of Moroccan and United States law enforcement which I am confident will continue to grow.

I would like to share with my colleagues an article from the November 23, 1984, Wall Street Journal by Joseph Verner Reed, U.S. Ambassador to the Kingdom of Morocco, in which he addresses United States-Morocco cooperation. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

MOROCCO'S "UNION" WITH LIBYA IS A NONSTARTER

(By Joseph Verner Reed)

Morocco is not well known to most Americans, but it has been much in the news since August's dramatic announcement that Libya and Morocco would merge into a single political "union." As President Reagan's envoy in Morocco for the past three years, it has been my privilege to observe and even, I hope, contribute to present close relations between the U.S. and the Kingdom of Morocco.

Close relations with a foreign state do not exist in a vacuum; they are not just the result of individuals or personal diplomacy, although the president and King Hassan do, in fact, have a strong personal rapport that helps to reinforce close relations between our two governments. In the end, however, close interstate relations depend on common values and a shared instinct for self-preservation in a hostile world. Such interests do not alter overnight with a change of administration or tactical shifts by either country.

Our relations with Morocco date from 1787, when the Sultan of Morocco was among the first foreign leaders to formally recognize our independence. In the intervening two centuries, relations generally have remained good.

Today, the U.S. and Morocco are linked by an intricate pattern of agreements in fields from legal assistance to cultural exchange, from investment to security.

Why should the U.S. need or depend on a friend in North Africa? Geography provides the answer, as it did in two world wars: Morocco sits astride the world's most vital waterway, the Strait of Gibraltar. It is also a moderate midpoint between America and the Persian Gulf on which the U.S. might one day depend.

In politics as well, King Hassan—currently chairman of the Arab League and its Jerusalem Committee and of the Islamic Conference—has exerted a moderating influence in a volatile region by contributing to efforts to find a peaceful solution to the problems of Israel and its Arab neighbors. The king also, last January at Casablanca, worked to end Egypt's isolation from the Islamic Conference, which numbers over 40 predominantly Islamic countries. King Hassan has also set an example of harmony for his region, hosting a conference of Moroccan Jewish communities in Rabat last May, attended by members of the Israeli Knesset and world Jewish leaders. (Morocco has the largest Jewish population in the Arab world.)

I do not mean to suggest that our objectives—or those of any two sovereign states for that matter—are identical. Far from it; Morocco has national interests, as in the Western Sahara, and we, as a world power, also have goals that the other side does not necessarily share.

Geography in part also determines tactics. From a distance we have sought, for example, after 15 years of Libyan-backed terrorism, to quarantine Muammar Qadhafi. Morocco, as a neighbor in the Maghreb, has chosen by constrast to engage him, seeking to moderate the Libyan leader's unconscionable behavior. While we wish King Hassan well in "taming" the Libyan dictator, we can have no illusions that the process will be easy.

Such differences, however, should not be allowed to obscure the clear-cut interests that we and Morocco share or to call into question a relationship to which both sides remain committed. King Hassan has assured us that union with Libya will not affect bilateral relations with the U.S., and the U.S. will be following the treaty's implementation in that light.

Over the past month, I have covered over 3,000 miles by road throughout the interior of Morocco, called on 20 governors and countless local officials. I have met with a broad range of the Moroccan population—from nomads in the Sahara to Berbers in the Atlas. The vast majority of Moroccans, it seems to me, are unaffected by and uninterested in the union with Libya, which they see as having little practical effect on their daily lives. They are, by contrast, genuinely friendly toward the U.S. and eager to further strengthen the relationship in a variety of fields.

In the longer run, political unions come and go in the Middle East, but—at least in the view of this American ambassador—the ties forged over two centuries between the U.S. and Morocco are likely to prove more lasting.

ABE PLOUGH: A MAN OF STATURE

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, Tennessee and the Nation suffered a great loss on September 14, 1984. On that day, Mr. Abe Plough passed away at the age of 92.

Mr. Plough was the founder of Plough, Inc., which is now the Schering-Plough Corp. He founded this pharmaceutical firm on the fundamentals of hard work, integrity, and commitment to quality. Schering-Plough presently employs over 28,000 people and does business in 100 countries around the world. All of this started from a young man going door-to-door selling patent medicines.

But Abe Plough was more than a successful businessman. He was a noted philanthropist, giving generously, under the name of "Mr. Anonymous" to those less fortunate than himself. His basic philosophy was to "Do good and disappear."

Over the years, he donated millions of dollars to such charitable endeavors as the Salvation Army, the United Way, and Boys Town. He endowed a pharmacy scholarship at the University of Tennessee. Indeed, his benefactions are simply too many to be ever fully known.

Abe Plough was a loving family man and a devoted member of the Jewish community all of his life. His religious ideas were always practiced on a day to day basis. Abe Plough gave of himself. He will be sorely missed by family, friends, and community. But his spirit and good works serve as an example to all.

Mr. President, I ask that articles honoring Mr. Plough be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

[From the Schering-Plough Consumer Operations News, October 1984]

COMPANY MOURNS DEATH OF ABE PLOUGH

MEMPHIS.—The company was plunged into a "shock wave of grief" by the death of founder Abe Plough Sept. 14 following a short illness.

The city went into mourning for the man who founded Plough, Inc., March 8, 1908, with $125 borrowed from his father. He was only 16 then. At his death at 92, his creation is a worldwide leader in pharmaceutical and consumer products.

Mr. Plough had been in good health before entering Baptist Hospital Aug. 9 for a 5½-hour operation to remove a blood clot near his brain. His recovery seemed strong, and he went home Sept. 5. Unfortunately, bleeding ulcers forced his readmittance the following day. Death was attributed to a gastrointestinal disorder.

At all entrances to the plant and office buildings here, wreaths commemorated the life of a legend. Flags throughout the area were at half staff. Hundreds of employees attended memorial services at Temple Israel and the company cafeteria. Messages of grief and tribute poured into the company.

R. Lee Jenkins, executive vice president, said:

"The news of Mr. Plough's death sends a shock wave of grief throughout this company and the many thousands of present and former employees who worked with him and loved him.

"The fact that he went down fighting the age and the illness that would have stopped many men long before was typical of Mr. Plough. He was one of the toughest and the best.

"I've never known a man more dedicated to the high principles of honor and service to mankind. His wisdom, intellect and tenacity made him one of the great enterpreneurs of the century. His compassion for his fellow man and his generosity made him one of the most influential and beloved.

"Tens of thousands of people, perhaps hundreds of thousands across the world, have benefited directly and indirectly because of his contributions to the business of health and beauty care and from his private philanthropies.

"I count the loss of my very dear friend as a great one, to me personally, to the corporation and perhaps most of all to the city that he loved so much."

Robert Luciano, chairman, president and chief executive officer of Schering-Plough:

"Abe Plough's entire life is truly a testament to initiative and industry.

"His enterprising character and philanthropy have left a record that is singularly unique in American life as well as in the business world. We at Schering-Plough will especially miss his guidance, good humor and gentle humanness."

At the emotion-charged company memorial service Sept. 17, Malcolm Glover, a packer in Shipping with 41 years of service, said:

"Because Mr. Plough made this company such a success, and I am part of this company, he made me a success, too!"

Reggie Gaines, 23 years a Packaging line operator, said, "we miss the days he strolled into our area. He always had a smile and a warm 'hello.' Sometimes he joined us in the break area. He always made us feel a little more important in this vast company."

Ingrid Cooper, 24 years in Packaging, said, "He has left an everlasting mark on this town, this country, this world and you and me. Because he was, this world is a better place to be."

Dan Hallford, retired after 37 years as an executive, recalled, "Even though he was an exacting and tough taskmaster, he also had an uncanny sense of knowing when you needed to be picked up and patted on the back. He was warm and sympathetic . . ."

Lee Jenkins said, "Being employees together, we all have a common bond with Abe Plough. Let's remember him as he would want us to do: Not with high-sounding words, but with dedication to our work—to be the best we can be. Not with mourning, but with a celebration of life—ours and those persons around us. Not with eulogies to him, but by helping each other to be more than, by ourselves, we could ever be.

"If we remember him in these ways, he not only lives on in the embodiment of the company he founded, and of which we are a part, he lives on through us."

At the Sept. 16 service at Temple Israel Synagogue, Rabbi Harry Danziger said:

"It is tempting to say two syllables with nine letters—Abe Plough—and then be silent. • • • He did what he did because he knew what a man ought to do, and Abe Plough never closed his eyes to duty."

A fund is being established for employees wishing to make charitable gifts in memory of Mr. Plough, with Mike Pietrangelo, senior vice president, in charge.

One of eight children, Mr. Plough was born Dec. 27, 1891 in Tupelo, Miss., the son of Moses and Julia Plough. The family moved to Memphis within a year.

Young Plough completed the eighth grade, then dropped out of school to work full-time in a drug store. He developed a fascination for the business. In early 1908, he founded Plough Chemical Co. (the name was changed to Plough, Inc., in 1929) on the second floor of his father's business at 83 North Second, Memphis.

His first product was Plough's Antiseptic Healing Oil. Because the oil was not well known, he soon began to trade it for other drugs he could sell to wholesale houses.

in 1971, Mr. Plough guided the consolidation with the Schering Corp., a major pharmaceutical company. He became chairman of the board. He retired Sept. 1, 1976, after 68 years, 5 months and 24 days, and was named honorary chairman of the board.

EULOGY FOR MR. PLOUGH PRAISES LIFE OF SERVICE

Below are excerpts of the eulogy for Abe Plough delivered by Rabbi Harry Danziger at Temple Israel on Sept. 16:

Abe Plough—As I look out at this outpouring of people—people from every cross section of Memphis and the Mid-South—there is a temptation simply to speak those two words—those nine letters—Abe Plough—and then to be silent. If I were to do so, this sanctuary would be filled silently, not only with people, but with recollections and remembrances, with tributes and memorials, far more eloquent than any words than I can speak. Such was the man—such was his life—such is this moment. To say the name Abe Plough in this community is to evoke moving memories of a man of whom I can say with utter certainty, no major city in America ever owed so much of itself to a single human being. People in this community who might agree with one another on little else about what is good and right for Memphis and Shelby County are agreed on one thing—Abe Plough was good for all of us. And people agree on that in superlatives, and they base their agreement on the most solid of facts.

This man—a living legend—would not permit age to be either an excuse or a reason for ending his good work. Out of hundreds, let me cite only two instances. It is now well known that, in the strife and turmoil of 1968 in this city, the negotiations between labor and government were stymied by city government's lack of funds to pay the wage increase agreed upon. Mr. Plough was, then, 78 years old. Were any single individual of any age in a major American city to have stepped forward—quite literally—to subsidize a great metropolitan government, it would have been unprecedented. That a man of nearly four score years personally planted the seeds of peace and harmony, not simply with his money but most of all with his vision, must surely boggle the mind. Others had planted for him now; now he planted for the future.

He recalled the past with reverence and gratitude—but he built for the future with generosity and vision.

Not only did Mr. Plough never permit age to be an excuse or reason for detaching himself from worthwhile causes, neither did he come to his spirit of generosity and community concern late in life. It would be understandable if he had determined that, having accomplished all he wanted for himself in the world of business, then and only then would he turn to the wider world. Not Abe Plough. I suspect that the single act of loving kindness which he did which most moved me personally was one he performed some sixty years ago when he was a young man. You may have read or heard of it. A savings institution in Memphis collapsed, and the depositors, unprotected in those days by insurance, stood to lose their savings, large and small. Abe Plough reached deeply into his wealth but deeper by far into his heart to make certain that not a single person of modest means lost a penny of his or her life savings.

He was constant in his generosity of spirit, in his commitment to plant seeds of a better life, in his determination to touch the lives and hearts of people—in youth as in age, he was constant because he did what he did out of the convictions and the faith of a lifetime. He did what a man ought to do, and Mr. Plough never closed his eyes to duty. Rather he did that duty with a twinkle of satisfaction lighting them all the while.

That is one part of Abe Plough—that is the living legend of philanthropy and vision that made him indisputably the number one citizen of this city.

To us as a community—to us as races and religions and neighborhoods—to those who loved him best and knew him best—Mr. Plough has done in death as he did so often in life. He has given us innumerable gifts—and he has challenged us—challenged us to move forward—with vision and spirit—to enter—perhaps to create—the Promised Land.

THE RIGHT STUFF IN NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, 20 years ago, I recommended a young man from my hometown of Fargo for appointment to the U.S. Naval Academy. Of the many applicants, young James F. Buchli seemed to me to have the right stuff.

Tomorrow, Lt. Col. James Buchli of the U.S. Marine Corps is going to prove once again that he indeed possesses that rare blend of courage and ability we call the right stuff. When the space shuttle Discovery takes off from Cape Canaveral January 23, Jim Buchli will become the first North Dakotan in space.

I cannot tell much about what this talented young man will be doing on this new shuttle mission. As Senators know, it is dedicated to matters of defense. But I can tell a little bit about the astronaut himself.

He was born in New Rockford, ND, in 1945, and later moved to Fargo with his family. Always an avid outdoorsman, he and his twin brother spent much of their free time fishing, hunting, and camping.

His younger sister recalls that he was not a daredevil, but never turned down a challenge. She says that Jim achieved his goals in traditional North Dakota style—through quiet determination. He excelled in academics and sports. He became the State wrestling champion in his weight class in high school simply because he decided one day that would be his goal.

He became an astronaut through this same quiet determination. After receiving a string of military awards for service at home and overseas, Jim landed a spot in the U.S. Test Pilot School—where so many of those with the right stuff are found. It was there Jim decided to aim for the space program, and in 1978, NASA selected him. Tomorrow, his newest goal will be realized.

Lieutenant Colonel Buchli is a modest man, who does not feel compelled to boast of his many accomplishments. He says of tomorrow's mission that he just wants to "get on with the job." However, his record speaks for him.

A veteran of combat in Vietnam, Jim also served in Thailand and Japan. He holds the Air Medal, Navy Commendation Medal, Purple Heart, Combat Action Ribbon, Presidential Unit Citation, Navy Unit Citation, Meritorious Unit Citation, and a Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with Silver Star.

We who live in North Dakota are no strangers to the right stuff. From the settlers who carved homes out of our wild prairies a century ago, to Jim Buchli's flight to the newest frontier, North Dakotans have always had pioneering courage.

Like Jim Buchli, we usually keep pretty quiet about it. But when this young marine gets on with the job tomorrow, the rest of the Nation, and the world, will know about it.

I salute this young man's courage and determination.

MANAGING THE U.S-SOVIET RELATIONSHIP

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, in recent years one of the most serious failings in U.S. foreign policy has been the lack of a strategic framework for dealing with the Soviet Union.

For this reason, I would like to call my colleague's attention to a speech that the Secretary of State, George Shultz, delivered in October before the Rand/UCLA Center for the Study of Soviet International Behavior. The speech is entitled "Managing the U.S.-Soviet International Relationship Over the Long Term." The Secretary's message is an important one: The absence of a consistent, coherent American strategy can only be to the advantage of the Soviet Union. In the past we have tended to focus either on increasing our strength or on pursuing negotiations. An adequate strategy, according to the Secretary, must accommodate both simultaneously. It must be flexible, and above all, it must be sustainable over the long term.

I strongly recommend the Secretary's speech to all Senators and citizens who are looking for constructive approaches to the difficult problem of U.S.-Soviet relations. The recent advance in our relations with the Soviet Union is due in large measure, to Secretary Shultz' efforts, and his words are of special significance.

It remains for the administration and the Senate, with its unique responsibilities in foreign policy, to devise a plan for implementing the Secretary's recommendations. With the prospect of a new round of arms control negotiations before us, this task should be put at the top of the foreign policy agenda.

On January 31, the Secretary of State will testify before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at the first of a series of hearings on U.S. foreign policy. This will be an excellent opportunity for members to explore the strategy proposed by the Secretary with a view toward future action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of State's remarks on managing the U.S.-Soviet relationship be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANAGING THE U.S.-SOVIET RELATIONSHIP OVER THE LONG TERM

(Remarks of Secretary George Shultz)

This distinguished audience knows well that the Soviet Union presents us with a conceptual as well as a strategic challenge. Let me take advantage of this occasion, therefore, to raise what I see as some of these larger conceptual issues that face us in managing U.S.-Soviet relations over the long term.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE SYSTEMS

The differences between our two countries are profound. You and I know that, yet we need to reiterate it, remind ourselves of it, and reflect upon it. The United States and the Soviet Union have different histories, cultures, economies, governmental systems, force structures, geographical circumstances, and visions of the future. We cannot analyze the Soviet Union as if it were a mirror of ourselves.

We Americans stand by our values and defend our interests, but we also put great store by pragmatism, compromise, and flexibility in international life. Marxist-Leninist ideology subordinates all of these qualities to the so-called objective, scientific, and inevitable laws of history. We can debate how fully Soviet leaders follow this ideology. No doubt, however, it helps shape a political culture that does not accommodate well to compromise or truly positive relations with opponents. Their doctrine of history teaches them that their opponents are doomed to crisis and decline—and that the struggle between the two systems is a mortal struggle.

Most notable, perhaps, is the very different relationship between the government and the people in the Soviet Union and in the United States. Our national policies are the product of open debate, deliberation, and political competition guided by constitutional processes. In the Soviet Union, policy is the exclusive domain of a self-perpetuating ruling elite. Soviet leaders do not ignore public opinion; on the contrary, they vigorously seek to control it. Theirs is a system marked by repression and hostility to free political, intellectual, or religious expression. A nation whose system is the legacy of Marx, Lenin, and Stalin obviously bears scant resemblance to one that draws its inspiration from Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

When we in America conduct foreign policy, we must meet certain requirements that Soviet rulers can disregard. An American president must win and sustain support from the Congress and the American people if he is to lead the nation on any path, if our policy is to follow a steady course and a coherent strategy. Through this process, we gain the sustenance and commitment that come from democratic participation. And in the complex world of the 1980s and 1990s, the effectiveness of our dealings with the Soviets will benefit from a level of national understanding of the Soviet Union beyond what we have required, or had, in the past. That is why what the Rand/UCLA Center seeks to accomplish is so important, and why I look forward to the contribution that you can make.

THE COMPLEXITY OF MANAGING THE RELATIONSHIP

Today, despite these profound differences, it is obviously in our interest to maintain as constructive a relationship as possible with the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union is powerful; it occupies a very large part of a shrinking world; and its military strength, including its vast nuclear arsenal, is a reality that we cannot ignore. Its people are a great and talented people, and we can benefit from interchange with them. And we owe it to our own people, and to the future of the planet, to strive for a more constructive pattern of relations between our countries.

A brief review of the postwar period reminds us of how complex a task this is. For the past two decades, Soviet defense spending has grown at a rate of 3%–5% a year, even when the United States was cutting back its own defense expenditures. And the Soviets kept up this military expansion even in the face of mounting economic difficulties.

In the postwar period, the United States never sought to expand its territory nor used force to impose its will upon weaker nations, even when we were the world's preeminent power. The Soviets, however, have used force frequently—in East Berlin, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan. And it was their threat of force that imposed martial law on Poland.

It has been argued that Soviet behavior is partly motivated by a historical insecurity, that they suffer from an endemic paranoia stemming from centuries of war and foreign invasions. But this analysis is clearly inadequate. The problem is that the Soviets seek absolute security in a way that guarantees insecurity for everyone else. Their policies have created antagonism when opportunities existed for better relations; their vast military power—and their demonstrated willingness to use it—go far beyond legitimate self-defense and pose objective problems for the world community. The Soviet's interventionist policies in the Third World, for example, seem the result of ideology combined with new capability, not the product of "insecurity." In the past two decades they have expanded their influence in Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Central America by purveying arms and backing those who subvert neighbors or block peace.

The record shows that when the Soviets have perceived weakness, when they have seen a vacuum, they have seized the opportunity to gain an advantage. Their code of behavior has not included categories for voluntary restraint or self-denial.

And they have not hesitated to persecute those of their own people—whether intellectuals, religious figures, or average citizens—who dared to speak or write freely, or who sought to emigrate. After signing the Helsinki Final Act, which confirmed that human rights were a vital part of the diplomatic dialogue on peace and security in Europe, the Soviets and their East European allies even suppressed the very citizens' groups that were formed to monitor compliance with the Helsinki accord.

We are left with two inescapable truths: in the nuclear age we need to maintain a relationship with the Soviet Union. Yet we know that they have acted in ways that violate our standards of human conduct and rule by law and that are repugnant to us—and they will likely continue to do so in the future. What kind of relationship can we reasonably expect to have in these circumstances? How can we manage U.S.-Soviet relations in a way that can endure over a long period?

THE QUESTION OF LINKAGE

The U.S.-Soviet relationship, of course, is a global one. We impinge on each other's interests in many regions of the world and in many fields of endeavor. A sustained and sound relationship, therefore, will confront the fact that the Soviets can be expected periodically to do something abhorrent to us or threaten our interests.

This raises the question of linkage. Should we refuse to conclude agreements with the Soviets in one area when they do something outrageous in some other area? Would such an approach give us greater leverage over Moscow's conduct? Or would it place us on the defensive? Would it confirm our dedication to fundamental principles of international relations? Or would it make our diplomacy seem inconsistent? Clearly, linkage is not merely "a fact of life" but a complex question of policy.

There will be times when we must make progress in one dimension of the relationship contingent on progress in others. We can never let ourselves become so wedded to improving our relations with the Soviets that we turn a blind eye to actions that undermine the very foundation of stable relations. At the same time, linkage as an instrument of policy has limitations; if applied rigidly, it could yield the initiative to the Soviets, letting them set the pace and the character of the relationship.

We do not seek negotiations for their own sake; we negotiate when it is in our interest to do so. Therefore, when the Soviet Union acts in a way we find objectionable, it may not always make sense for us to break off negotiations or suspend agreements. If those negotiations or agreements were undertaken with a realistic view of their benefits for us, then they should be worth maintaining under all but exceptional circumstances. We should not sacrifice long-term interests in order to express immediate outrage. We must not ignore Soviet actions that trouble us. On the contrary, we need to respond forcefully. But in doing so, we are more likely to be successful by direct measures that counter the specific challenge.

When the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, President Carter said his opinion of the Soviet Union and its goals had changed more in 1 week than throughout his entire term of office. He canceled the grain agreement, withdrew his own arms limitation treaty from Senate consideration, refused participation in the Olympics, and stopped the annual meetings with Foreign Minister Gromyko. But did his actions serve our economic interests? Did they further progress toward a better arms agreement? Did they get Soviet troops out of Afghanistan?

When the Soviets shot down the Korean airliner, in contrast, President Reagan was not derailed from his steady, firm, and realistic course. He never had illusions about the Soviet Union. After the KAL [Korean Air Lines] shootdown, he focused attention on the menace to civil aviation posed by such conduct. He made sure the world knew the truth about the incident. But he also sent our arms control negotiators back to Geneva, because he believed that reducing nuclear weapons was a critical priority.

In the final analysis, linkage is a tactical question; the strategic reality of leverage comes from creating facts in support of our overall design. Over the longer term, we must structure the bargaining environment to our advantage by modernizing our defenses, assisting our friends, and showing we are willing to defend our interests. In this way we give the Soviets more of a stake, in their own interest, in better relations with us across the board.

THE NEED FOR A LONG-TERM STRATEGY

Sudden shifts in policy, stemming from emotional and perfectly understandable reactions to Soviet behavior, are not the way to pursue our interests. It seems to me that the West, if it is to compete effectively and advance its goals, must develop the capacity for consistency and discipline and must fashion—and stick to—a long-term strategy.

But consistency is difficult for a democracy. Historically, American policy has swung from one extreme to the other. We have gone through periods of implacable opposition—forgoing negotiations, building up our defenses, and confronting Soviet aggression. Then, concerned about confrontation, we have entered periods of seeming detente, during which some were tempted to neglect our defenses and ignore Soviet threats to our interests around the world—only once again to be disillusioned by some Soviet action that sent us swinging back to a more implacable posture.

We have tended all too often to focus either on increasing our strength or on pursuing a course of negotiations. We have found it difficult to pursue both simultaneously. In the long run, the absence of a consistent, coherent American strategy can only play to the advantage of the Soviet Union.

Therefore, we must come to grips with the more complex reality of our situation. A sustainable strategy must include all the elements essential to a more advantageous U.S.-Soviet relationship. We need to be strong, we must be ready to confront Soviet challenges, and we should negotiate when there are realistic prospects for success.

THE PURPOSES OF NEGOTIATION

Winston Churchill understood both the limits and the necessity of negotiating with the Soviet Union. In May 1953, he said: "It would, I think, be a mistake to assume that nothing can be settled with the Soviet Union unless or until everything is settled." In the 1980s, as then, the process of U.S.-Soviet negotiation has as its purposes both to avert dangerous confrontations and to reach agreements that are in our mutual interest.

If we are to be effective in negotiations, we need a clear sense of what we want to achieve.

The United States seeks an international environment that enhances the freedom, security, and prosperity of our own people, our allies and friends, and of all mankind. We know that such a promising future depends, above all, on stability and global security. It cannot be achieved in a world where aggression goes unchecked and where adventurous foreign policies succeed. Nor can it be achieved in a world where the two largest powers refuse to engage in constructive relations.

To pursue our goals successfully we must persuade the Soviets of two things:

First, that there will be no reward for aggression. We are strong enough and determined enough to resist attempts by the Soviet Union to expand its control by force; and Second, that we have no aggressive intentions. We mean no threat to the security of the Soviet Union. We are ready and willing, at all times, to discuss and negotiate our differences.

The conditions for successful negotiation exist when both sides stand to gain from an agreement or stand to lose from the absence of an agreement. We have to accept the fact that on many issues, our respective goals may be incompatible, making agreements impossible to reach. When this occurs, we should not despair or panic about the state of our relations. Certainly, we should never accept disadvantageous agreements for the sake of making negotiations seem successful. Occasional disappointments are part of the long-term process, and we should move on to seek negotiations when and where the conditions are ripe for progress.

Some argue that if you cannot trust the Soviets, you should not negotiate with them. But the truth is, successful negotiations are not based on trust. We do not need to trust the Soviets; we need to make agreements that are trustworthy because both sides have incentives to keep them. Such incentives operate best when there are clear and working means to verify that obligations undertaken are, in fact, carried out.

Each side will watch the other carefully to ensure that neither can gain a one-sided advantage by violating an agreement. If we spot Soviet violations, we must do what is necessary to protect ourselves and to raise the cost to the Soviets of further violations. We cannot allow them to use negotiations or agreements as a cover for actions that threaten our interests.

Sometimes it is said that plain statements by us about Soviet violations of agreements, whether on arms or human rights, harm our relationship. In our system, it is our obligation to speak out and tell the truth—to the Soviets, to the world, and to the American people. Our own values have claims on us, both to speak out honestly and to use our leverage when we can, and often quietly, for humanitarian goals. Those goals are not a burden on the U.S.-Soviet relationship; they are, for us, a key part of that relationship. If we can help a Shcharansky or Sakharov, or prevent the jailing of a priest in Lithuania, or ease the plight of Soviet Jewry, we have gained something worth negotiating for and worth using our influence to obtain—not to score points against the Soviets but because we are a moral people.

The experience of negotiations shows that the Soviets recognize reality and that tough, sober bargaining, when backed by American strength, can lead to mutually advantageous results. Negotiation without strength cannot bring benefits. Strength alone will never achieve a durable peace.

A POLICY OF STRENGTH AND NEGOTIATION

Throughout this Administration, President Reagan has adhered to this approach. He has based his policies toward the Soviet Union on a solid foundation of realism, strength, and negotation. This approach has created the objective conditions for a safer, more constructive relationship in the years ahead.

In light of Moscow's history of taking advantage of any weakness, it is not surprising that we suffered setbacks in the 1970s. In light of the recent clear improvement in our relative position, it is not surprising that Moscow is complaining about our policy. The 1970s were a time when our economy was deeply troubled, when our military capabilities were eroding, and when our self-confidence and sense of purpose both at home and overseas were at a low ebb. The Soviets had grounds for believing that what they call "the global correlation of forces" had shifted in their favor. And we, in turn, had grounds for fearing that they might overreach themselves and present us with a challenge that we could neither ignore nor effectively counter.

Since then, the United States, in particular, and the West, in general, have made an impressive turnaround. We have begun to recover lost ground and to move ahead.

Our own economic recovery is well underway. Sustained growth without inflation is within reach. The American economy has bounced back and is giving welcome impetus to global recovery.

The much-needed modernization of Western defense capabilities is on track. The gaps in the East-West military balance that were expanding in the 1970s are being narrowed and closed. The Soviets' temptation to preempt or intimidate at any point on the spectrum of deterrence must be diminishing.

We have restored the relations of confidence and harmony with our key allies in Europe and Asia, which have been the bedrock of American security throughout the postwar era. We have provided leadership in the community of nations joined to us by common values and common interest. Disagreements have, at times, been sharp, and debate vigorous, just as they are in our country. The result, however, just as here, has been increasing consensus on the challenges to the common security and widening agreement on what is required to meet those challenges.

Most important, we have restored our own confidence in ourselves. We know that we are capable of dealing with our problems and promoting our interests and ideals in a complex and dangerous world. We have renewed our commitment to democratic values and human rights, a commitment that joins us not only to our allies but to other millions across the globe.

These achievements put our relationship with Moscow on a substantially safer, sounder, and more durable basis. Our credibility as a strong and resolute nation has been enhanced. In contrast to the 1970s, Moscow has not only failed to add any new territory to its extended empire in the 1980s but it has been unable to prevent adverse trends in Central America, the Caribbean, Asia, and southern Africa. Some in Moscow must wonder if the "correlation of forces" is not shifting against them.

We hold to the principle that America should not negotiate from a position of weakness, and this Administration has ensured that we need not face such a prospect.

But we reject the view that we should become strong so that we need not negotiate. Our premise is that we should become strong so that we are able to negotiate. Nor do we agree with the view that negotiated outcomes can only sap our strength or lead to an outcome in which we will be the loser. We will stay strong to enforce the peace; we will bargain hard to ensure that any agreement we sign is reliable and verifiable; and we will negotiate seriously to find solutions that endure.

In bargaining with the Soviets, we are prepared for modest advances as well as major breakthroughs. We have made limited proposals designed to stabilize the current state of relations. And we have made ambitious proposals that, if accepted, could put the Soviet-American relationship on a fundamentally new and safer footing.

In conducting negotiations and discussions in the major areas of U.S.-Soviet relations—arms control, regional issues, human rights, and bilateral cooperation—we have been guided by four basic principles.

First, we must have a strong defense. The United States does not seek military superiority over the Soviet Union. But the Soviets must know that in the absence of equitable and verifiable agreements, we will proceed with defense programs that will deny them superiority. The test of arms control is whether it reduces the danger of war. An arms control agreement that controls the United States but does not control the Soviet Union would only increase the danger of war. We know we will adhere to agreements; based on their conduct, we cannot be sure they will. Therefore, agreements must be reliable and verifiable.

Second, we must be united both at home and with our friends and allies. We must continue to strengthen our alliances and friendships and, above all, reaffirm and reinvigorate our own bipartisan consensus about the need for a foreign policy based on realism, strength, and negotiation.

Third, we must be patient. We cannot abandon negotiations or change our whole strategy each time the Soviets misbehave. We must not allow ourselves to panic or overreact to every fresh demonstraton of incivility or intransigence. Nor can we abandon our defenses or forget the importance of our friends and allies each time there is a period of negotiating success.

Fourth, we must be purposeful, flexible, and credible. We must negotiate with the Soviet Union on the basis of equality and reciprocity, in ways that demonstrate to the Soviets and to our friends our commitment to reaching agreements that are in the interests of both sides. We stand ready to join the Soviets in equal and verifiable arms reduction agreements, and we are prepared to move rapidly to discuss both offensive and defensive systems, including those that operate in or through space.

FUTURE PROSPECTS

This was the spirit in which President Reagan and I conducted our recent discussions with Deputy Prime Minister Gromyko. We set out for him our agenda for the years ahead. We presented some new ideas for getting nuclear arms control negotiations on track and for achieving some worthwhile results. We offered a dialogue on regional issues, to avoid crises and aid the search for peaceful solutions. We urged the Soviets to take steps in the human rights area. And we outlined constructive measures to improve bilateral cooperation in a variety of fields.

Our discussions with Mr. Gromyko lead me to conclude that the Soviets are interested in continuing our dialogue and in exploring ways to enrich that dialogue and turn it into concrete results.

What can we expect? The Soviets may now realize that it is in their interest to engage with us on the larger issues in a constructive way. Their intransigence in walking away from negotiations has brought them nothing.

A patriotic Russian looking back over the history of our relations would find it difficult to construe how the policy of rejection that Moscow has been following has served his country well. And he would surely realize that such a policy will prove even more costly in the future. In weighing his present choices, he would have to ask some very pointed questions.

If the Soviet Union will not accept equitable arms agreements, then the United States and its allies will continue their modernization programs. Is there any Soviet gain in this result?

If the Soviet Union pursues aggressive policies in the Third World, and not least in our own hemisphere, that threaten us and our friends, then we will respond equally strongly. Isn't the level of armed conflict in the Third World too high already?

If improvement in Soviet human rights performance continues, as in the past, to be nothing more than the cynical manipulation of human lives for political purposes, then the Soviets cannot expect that international—and internal—pressures for better performance will stop growing. Doesn't the Soviet Union pay a price for this censure and for the isolation that goes with it? The price is large and steadily increasing.

We pose these questions knowing full well that a state founded on the theory that the global correlation of forces must move in its direction does not easily alter its course to suit new and changed circumstances. The temptation, if not the compulsion, is always present to create new facts to confirm an old theory. Therefore, we should not count on, or even expect, immediate and exciting breakthroughs.

But the way is wide open to more sustained progress in U.S.-Soviet relations than we have known in the past. In recent months, there have been at least a few signs of Soviet willingness to meet us halfway on some secondary but contentious issues. We have been able to agree to upgrade the Hot Line, to extend our 10-year economic cooperation agreement, and to open negotiations to expand cultural exchanges. And, of course, Moscow has made it possible for us to resume high-level contacts. These are welcome steps: they just may herald more substantial and productive moves to come. And I can tell you, certainly, that President Reagan welcomes yesterday's statement by Chairman Chernenko that the Soviets are ready to pursue a constructive dialogue with us.

We cannot confidently fathom, much less predict, the direction of Soviet policy. We recognize that much of Soviet behavior stems from problems and pressures within their own system. Our statements and our actions are often far less relevant to their decisions than some might think. During this Administration, President Reagan has had to deal not with one Soviet leader but three, which has not made the negotiating process any easier.

What we have begun to do over the past 4 years, and can continue to do in the future, is to persuade Soviet leaders that continued adventurism and intransigence offer no rewards. We have provided persuasive reasons for the Soviets to choose, instead, a policy of greater restraint and reciprocity. We must be comfortable with the requirements of such a strategy, including its price, its risks, and its predictable periodic setbacks. We must be able to deter Soviet expansionism at the same time as we seek to negotiate areas of cooperation and lower levels of armaments.

These are the essential elements of our long-term policy. If we pursue such a strategy with wisdom and dedication, we have a much better prospect for achieving our goals: countering the Soviet challenge, directing the competition into less dangerous channels, and eventually forging a more constructive relationship.

"FAMILIES TOGETHER" ESSAY CONTEST WINNERS

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am pleased to welcome here today three outstanding young constituents of mine—Kathy Maxfield, Dawn Gebhart, and Troy Cambre. These three young people are winners, both in the figurative and literal sense of the word.

Kathy, Dawn, and Troy are the grand prize winners of the Families Together Drug Awareness Essay Contest. I was a judge in this contest, and rarely have I been faced with a more difficult task. Many fine young students, at the high school, middle school, and elementary level, submitted essays detailing their feelings and experiences concerning drug abuse, and many of them were truly excellent. Contestants could choose from five themes for their subject: "My friend has a drug problem;" "My community should develop drug-free alternatives for young people;" "As a teenager, I wish I could help my country become drug-free;" "Even though I am only in elementary school, I know there is a drug problem in our community;" and "As a recovering chemically dependent young adult * * *."

With this and other efforts to achieve a drug-free youth, the group sponsoring this essay contest, Families Together, is to be commended for its continued activity on behalf of children. This fine organization has been particularly effective in letting adolescents know that drugs are destructive, and that drug-free alternatives are available and fun.

Mr. President, it was a pleasure to be involved in this essay contest, and I am happy to enclose the products of the winners. I congratulate each and every one of the participants, and wish them every continued success.

I ask unanimous consent that their essays be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essays were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 23, 1983.

My friend is sixteen and she has a drug problem. She has a lot that she needs to share but just doesn't know how.

She started using drugs at fourteen and continued using them for two years. Starting with just pot and alcohol, she eventually got into harder drugs.

When she first started using drugs it was to acquire more friends. She felt more grown up and part of the group. After about two months on pot and alcohol, she found that she needed something stronger. By fifteen, she turned to drugs like acid and cocaine and slowly her life started falling apart.

She was constantly arguing with her parents and allowed her boyfriend to physically and mentally abuse her. She was nearly arrested several times and her school work usually went undone. She was unhappy, scared, lonely and depressed, but too confused to seek help. She was really hurting but just couldn't stop doing the insane things she was doing, including stealing from her family and friends.

I wanted so much to help my friend but she wouldn't let me into her heart. She had so much to share, so much to give, but just couldn't find the way.

OCTOBER 19, 1984.

At age sixteen my parents knew that I needed help so they put me in a drug rehabilitation program called "Straight." Since then my life has completely turned around. I've been in treatment one year and am close to graduating. I've learned a lot about drugs and their effects. I know that I can have a relapse at any time, but I have a program which I follow every day which really helps me. I've also learned that drug abuse is a disease of the feelings and that I need to share with God, my family and friends when I have a problem. When life gets rough, I think about my past and realize I never want to go back to that. I am now seventeen and really enjoy being with my family and doing things with them.

Today my friend has become an honest, understanding, loving and caring person. She has so much to share which we can now share every day. My friend is Me.

MY FRIEND HAS A DRUG PROBLEM

This "friend" of mine who has a drug problem is not only a friend, for he is my loving brother.

My brother is the smartest man I know when it comes to his job. However, when it comes to the question of yes or no on drugs, here he loses his smarts.

It's hard to believe that my brother is twenty years of age. I really don't quite know how it all started with him on drugs. I do know that this nightmare began about four years ago.

I remember him coming home really messed up. It was really a very sad sight to see. He even managed to get into more car wrecks than I can remember. Never did he get seriously injured, except for in the heart and mind. This affected the whole family, especially my parents. I can remember listening to my parents yell at him. I'd always end up crying. Reflecting back, I guess they did it for his own good.

Now he's really straightened up. He's still great at his job and a super "friend" and brother. He somehow thinks he is the failure of the family. However, we all know that is just not true. I think deep down inside he knows it too! I just would like my brother to know that he isn't a failure and that we love him with all our heart and soul.

I know he has had some rough times, but he's always been able to work them out. So, I know he can do it, just one more time. I have faith in him, for I know he can do it! Please try with all your heart and soul. I know you can.

I love you!

OCTOBER 18, 1984.

I WISH I COULD HELP MY COUNTRY BECOME DRUG-FREE

I wish I could help my country become drug-free. I am 11 years old and I am mad. Everywhere I look there is drugs around me. I knew a friend that was on drugs he is wasting his life right now. I am lucky my dad is a cop and he teaches me what drugs can do to you. I should send a letter to the government and tell them what I think we should do. I would tell my friends what drugs can do to them. Then they would tell there parents. The parents would tell the mayor. The mayor would tell the county commissioner. He would tell the supreme court. The supreme court would tell the state legislature in Tallahassee. The state legislature told the people in Washington D.C.

Washington D.C. might pass a law to end all drug dealing. All this is because a 11 year old cared.

SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, on January 22, 1985, millions of people in the Ukraine, and thousands of Ukrainian Americans in Ohio and across these United States mark the 67th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. It would be inappropriate, however, to say that most Ukrainians celebrate on this anniversary, because the millions of Ukrainians in the Soviet Union still lack the basic human rights and freedoms of an independent people.

Since 1920, the people of the Ukraine have lived under the repressive rule of the Soviet Union. During these more than 60 years, the Soviets have tried to obliterate the national identity of the Ukraine. Despite systematic and unrelenting attacks by the Soviets on their customs, language and religion, the Ukrainian people have yet to let their desire for fundamental freedoms be dimmed. The people of the Ukraine are the most outspoken voice of nationalism in the Soviet Union, and by all accounts, their continuing struggle against Soviet domination shows that the attempts at Russification of the Ukraine have been far from successful.

In today's fast-paced world with major human rights problems in countries such as South Africa, Chile, and Afghanistan, it would be easy to overlook a human rights struggle that is over 60 years old. Yet, as citizens of the freest nation on Earth, it is our responsibility to support the people of the Ukraine in their quest for the same basic human rights and freedoms which we enjoy and to which we believe all human beings are entitled. Our observance of Ukrainian Independence Day can serve as a reminder that we do support the hope of freedom so cherished by the people of the Ukraine, and by all other people living under totalitarianism. By making note of this 67th anniversary, we can help keep the dream alive for Ukrainians everywhere, that one day the people of the Ukraine may indeed be free.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF UKRAINE

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, yesterday, the Nation rejoiced as our President took the oath of office and swore to uphold and defend our Constitution. It was a day for celebrating our freedom, and the strength and vitality of our democracy.

So many people in this world are denied this kind of celebration. Indeed, they are denied the most fundamental political and human rights. I am thinking in particular of the people of the Ukraine, for today marks the 67th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine.

Although the valiant Ukrainian fighters were eventually defeated by the Bolsheviks, the dream of a free Ukraine has not died. Political and religious repression have not daunted those Ukrainians who are determined to continue the struggle for human rights for the people of the Ukraine.

Ukrainians in the free world look to the United States to lend moral support to their cause, especially on this important anniversary.

It is in this spirit that I want to share with my colleagues the following letter which I received from the president of the North Dakota Branch of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America. The letter eloquently explains the significance of January 22 to all freedom-loving Ukrainians, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator QUENTIN BURDICK,
Hart Senate Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BURDICK: On January 22, Ukrainian people in the free world will celebrate the 67th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Ukraine. This proclamation was made in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, on January 22, 1918.

Following this declaration, the sovereign state of Ukraine struggled for three years against the Russian Bolsheviks. They succumbed to the aggressor who established in Ukraine a communist government known as the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Under the Communist rule, millions of Ukrainians have been annihilated. In 1983, Ukrainians in the free world called attention to the 50th anniversary of the man-made famine which caused the death of seven million Ukrainians. Today, churches in Ukraine are still closed or destroyed, the clergy and faithful persecuted. All aspects of Ukrainian life are controlled and directed by Moscow.

Arrests, trials, convictions of thousands of Ukrainians charged with "anti-Soviet propaganda and agitation" have been made. Unfair trials and harsh sentences have been given to members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Accord Monitoring Groups. Extended prison terms are now being given to anyone who dares to speak.

Ukraine cannot accept cruel foreign domination, russification of her language and youth, the dissipation of her culture, destruction of religion and the annihilation of the country.

Each year in this great country of the United States, from coast to coast, January 22 is proclaimed as Ukrainian Independence Day. It is in the spirit of liberty, faith and justice that America gives moral support to the Ukrainian people.

This is the first year that we are without the encouragement and guidance of Dr. Anthony Zukowsky. He always assured us that our Congressmen, like you Senator Burdick, would do all in your power to support the Ukrainian cause.

We thank the President of the United States and Members of the United States Congress for their continued support to the Ukrainian people in their continued struggle for human rights.

Sincerely,

BOHDAN MAKARUK,
President, UCCA State Branch of North Dakota.

PLIGHT OF THE MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, last week while the Congress was in recess I woke up to the headline "State to lose 800 mining jobs in Kerr-McGee closures." The article was referring to Cibola, Eddy, and Grant Counties in my State of New Mexico. The newspaper article reported the end of Kerr-McGee's Ambrosia Lake uranium mines and mill, and the shutdown of the potash mine between Carlsbad and Hobbs.

This was not a marginal operation. The shutdown of the Quiveria Mining Co., a division of the Kerr-McGee Corp., is a terrible sign for this industry. It is a terrible blow for my State's economy. It is estimated that in 1980 the company created over $600 million of economic activity. That figure will be $20 million this year.

The very next day Western Nuclear announced that it was shutting down its uranium mining operations near Thoreau, leaving only Homestake Mining as a producer of the vitally important yellowcake.

In the last 4 years more than 800 families with jobs in the uranium industry have had to face the questions: How are we going to pay the bills? Where are we going to go, what are we going to do?

In the potash industry more than 1,000 jobs have been lost. Kerr-McGee is one of the most recent, but unfortunately for Grants, going out of business is not new: Conoco, Phillips, and Asarco have already pulled out.

Ideal Basic Industries, Inc. is also looking to sell Potash Co. of America which has operations in Carlsbad and Canada.

If misery loves company, the copper industry can commiserate with potash and uranium. Right now, Kennecott is proposing to cut wages and benefits of union employees by $6 an hour to try and keep the copper mines in New Mexico open and to help the depressed U.S. copper industry.

Numbers serve to discipline the rhetoric, so let me give you a few startling statistics that show that I am not just being rhetorical. The numbers emphasize the seriousness of the mining industry's plight. We are in real danger of losing 75 percent of our copper industry and 40 percent to 50 percent of our iron-ore industry. I believe that more than 90 percent of the U.S. potash industry is in peril as well. These are big operations that cannot open and close with ease.

As each of these mines close, it means death for the community life which revolves around it. In most instances the end is as permanent as the death of a soldier who has fought hard to make his country great. The problem is that this administration is not paying attention and no one is even showing up for the funeral.

The recovery of 1983-84 largely bypassed the mining regions of America. Now, after a prolonged period of painful losses, these companies are reeling from shrinking markets, huge debt and depressed prices.

The plight of the mining industry is not a simple example of an industrial megatrend—the shift of the production and processing of all basic materials from the industrial countries to the Third World just because these countries can produce at a cheaper price. The facts do not support this assertion.

In the case of the copper industry, the United States has been responsible for almost every technological advancement. Great strides have been made in reducing costs. A recent Bureau of Mines report calculates that the average production cost for U.S. copper is 65 cents per pound. Some units are considerably less. Copper companies and labor unions are currently talking about reducing labor costs. This may be necessary but unless the United States does something about unfair and subsidized competition, the United States is not going to have a copper industry.

The U.S. industry has spent more than $1.3 billion in the last 5 years to make the U.S. copper industry state of the art. The industry has clearly done its part for survival, and maybe even more.

U.S. copper workers are the most productive in the world. They have done their work well, they deserve to keep their jobs.

It should be kept in mind that many of the foreign operations that are still producing at full capacity have much higher workers have jobs is because of their government's policies. The reason U.S. workers have no jobs is because of our Government's policies, and that needs to change.

The administration's response to the plight of the copper industry has been a deaf ear and a lot of talk about free trade, realignments, comparative advantages, and sectorial shifts. The State Department appears to be only concerned about its relationship with Chile, Zambia, and Zaire the USA must be concerned about both and can be. The Treasury Department is more concerned about making sure these poor countries can continue to pay the lucrative fees necessary to reschedule and reschedule the LDC debt. The U.S.T.R. lives in an ivory tower espousing the free trade philosophy. Collectively, it reminds me of Nero playing the fiddle while Rome burned.

The industry's dire straits ripple far beyond the dozen or more companies and the handful of affected States.

In 1981, U.S. metals mining was an $8.9 billion enterprise. By 1983, it had shrunk to just $5.9 billion. The jobs provided exceeded 109,000 in 1981. At the beginning of this year, what remains is a workforce of about 44,800. The prognosis is a further reduction of another 30 percent.

A series of factors account for mining's closed or up-for-sale predicament. I will put the factors in two categories. The first is what I consider the "creative destruction factors." These are the exploitative and, in some cases, predatory practices of developing countries. They already have cheap labor and very low-cost reserves. But these countries are not content with this formidable pair of economic advantages.

They subsidize, they dump, they close their markets to our producers. It is glaringly apparent that foreign competitors are not interested in free trade, they do not believe that their comparative advantages are sufficient. They are clearly aggressively pursuing the creative destruction of the mining industry in the United States.

In addition, they apply for and receive concessionary loans from the World Bank and other multilateral development institutions to increase capacity to produce metals that the world already has too much of already.

They disregard supply and demand market forces. In a misguided quest for foreign exchange, they produce at full capacity even when the price of a commodity drops below their cost. It is ironic that these Third World countries are exploiting their resources to their own detriment by selling below their production costs.

These predatory practices of themselves are bad enough, but it is only half of the story. The second category of factors contributing to the economic demise of our mining sector is the "passive destructive factors."

The passive destructives are the policies being pursued by the United States in its blind commitment to free trade instantly, all of a sudden, right now. Let me give some examples of the passive destructive which is rampant in this administration. Last year, the U.S. copper industry tried to use our trade laws to get relief. They won their section 201 case unanimously before the International Trade Commission. This was in view of a 140-percent increase in imports in the past 4 years, and the loss of 18,000 good paying jobs. The U.S. industry convinced the ITC that it was competitive by showing that 14 of the 25 largest U.S. mines have been completely overhauled with state-of-the-art equipment since 1952.

The administration had an opportunity to restore balance to the depressed copper market, give the U.S. industry some relief and save 18,000 jobs. It refused, as did the administration that preceded it.

Later in the year, Congress passed a resolution finding that the United States should enter into negotiations for production restraint agreements with the major foreign copper producing countries to restore the law of supply and demand. The response has been a task force of middle-level bureaucrats who are merely repackaging their memos on the section 201 case. This is what I mean by passive destruction of a vital sector of our economy.

The Commerce Department has been sitting on a potash dumping case for months. Apparently, the Commerce Department is reluctant to determine the appropriate tariff that should be imposed against the Soviet Union. This foot dragging is another example of passive destruction. To these industries, every day is critical and delay is deadly. If you need an example, consider Kerr-McGee, which I mentioned in my opening remarks.

The uranium industry has been victimized by creative destruction and passive destruction as well. It is an example of what will happen to many of our mineral and metals industries if we do not, as a nation, focus on what is happening in the world market. The demand for uranium has declined while international companies have aggressively expanded. They have been able to do this because of direct and indirect intervention of their foreign governments and because of very rich resources. As a result, the spot-market price for uranium has dropped from over $40 per pound to $5.50. No significant long-term contracts have been signed with domestic producers because of this glut of very cheap uranium.

We all agree that eventually the market will come into balance. The Department of Energy, which is legally responsible for monitoring this industry and maintaining its viability, has argued that it is indeed viable. They argue the industry will go through a period of retraction and reorganization. The result will be a viable industry.

But, Mr. President, how many companies which might have elected to hang in there will not? They will not, because they see foreign governments assisting their competition. They will not, because our utilities and our Government have sent no clear signal that they wish to avoid import dependence. To the contrary—the DOE now operates its uranium enrichment business in a fashion that negatively affects U.S. production of uranium. I have argued that, in the face of such facts our industries will abandon uranium mining. They will put their money elsewhere.

Mr. President, policymakers in this administration with a simplistic view of economics and no experience with the uranium business will argue that, in time, some company will take Quiveras' place. That might be true, if foreign producers were not protected from similar economic conditions. They will expand to fill the gap left by Quivera. That share of the market will be lost forever.

We, as a nation, learned the horrible truth about being dependent on oil imports. We will, I am afraid, learn that same lesson with strategic minerals and uranium.

The Energy Information Agency has projected that aggressive marketing by foreign uranium producers could result in their capturing over 80 percent of our market by the late 1980's. Yet the Department of Energy says everything is OK for the future. Is this passive destruction?

The U.S. mining industry is not asking to be a prima donna. It just wants to be able to perform on its own merits. We have the most productive workers in the world. I find it hard to believe that there is no role for them in the world economy of the 1980's.

I am looking at legislation that will put a stop to both the creative destruction and the passive destruction that is plaguing our American mining companies.

I wanted to take some time today to bring you up to date, to let you know of my commitment and determination to correct this deplorable situation.

Thank you very much, Mr. President.

MEMORANDUMS OF DISAPPROVAL RECEIVED FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The following messages from the President withholding his approval of certain Senate bills were received after the sine die adjournment of the 98th Congress:

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I am withholding my approval of S. 540, the "Health Research Extension Act of 1984," which would extend and amend the biomedical research authorities of the National Institutes of Health [NIH].

I have been assured by the Department of Health and Human Services that the Continuing Resolution gives adequate authority for current NIH activities in fiscal year 1985.

This Administration has a record of strong commitment to the support and conduct of biomedical research by the NIH. Each year since taking office, I have requested increases for biomedical research. In 1985, the NIH will receive its largest increase in appropriated funds in history. This increase will ensure the continued operation of the NIH for the coming year and will continue to assist in improving medical practice and the health of the American people.

Rather than improve our research efforts, however, the unfortunate result of S. 540 would be to impede the progress of this important health activity by:

Creating unnecessary, expensive new organizational entities;

—two institutes would be created, an arthritis and a nursing institute. This reorganization of the NIH is premature in light of a study of the NIH organizational structure to be released in a few weeks by the Institute of Medicine/National Academy of Sciences.

—numerous bodies, such as a National Commission on Orphan Diseases, an Interagency Committee on Learning Disabilities, and a Lupus Erythematosus Coordinating Committee, would be created for which there are existing mechanisms that could or already perform such functions.

Mandating overly specific requirements for the management of research that place undue constraints on Executive branch authorities and functions;

—new positions would be created and numerous reports required that would divert scarce resources away from the NIH central mission of basic biomedical research.

—the various NIH peer review groups would be exempted from the provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act and Office of Management and Budget oversight. This represents an unwarranted interference with internal Executive branch management over the largest number of advisory groups for any Federal agency.

Going beyond the Administration's request to extend only expiring authorities by rewriting all the relevant statutes of the NIH;

—current law contains sufficient authority and flexibility to carry out the important research and training activities of NIH, to respond to public concerns, and to meet scientific needs and opportunities. Imposing a uniform set of authorities for each research institution disregards the more extensive mission of some institutes and overburdens smaller institutes which do not need these additional programmatic and advisory responsibilities.

—this attempt to recodify existing statutory language has resulted in some so-called technical revisions that will result in undesired operational changes in some of the institute programs.

I want to underscore my commitment to biomedical research and the National Institutes of Health. The NIH has stood as an example of excellence for 40 years. I do not believe that it is either necessary or wise to revise completely the laws under which it has so successfully operated.

I therefore find no reasonable justification for the extensive changes to the NIH mandated by S. 540. In order to better serve the promise and the future of our national biomedical research enterprise, I am withholding my approval of this bill.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 30, 1984.

S. 2574

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I am withholding my approval of S. 2574, the "Public Health Service Act Amendments of 1984," which would extend and amend various health professions and services authorities. I have been assured by the Department of Health and Human Services that the Continuing Resolution provides adequate authority for these programs for fiscal year 1985.

S. 2574 is a seriously flawed piece of legislation. The most serious of its many objectionable provisions include the following:

First, the bill contains authorization levels substantially in excess of my 1985 Budget. Full funding of all the programs in the bill through 1987 would total $2.4 billion, 41 percent more than the $1.7 billion contained in the Budget.

Moreover, S. 2574 would continue to increase obsolete Federal subsidies to health professions students and would maintain the static and rigid categorical framework to deliver such aid. The ability of medical schools to supply our society with health professionals has changed dramatically in the last 20 years. Today, our medical schools are producing nearly 16,000 new doctors each year. Although there may be some shortages of physicians and nurses in particular areas of the country, the Nation as a whole is facing a future surplus—not shortage—of physicians and nurses. Under these circumstances, S. 2574, a bill which continues excessive taxpayer subsidies to health professionals and maintains a rigid unworkable categorical framework, cannot be justified.

S. 2574 takes the wrong approach to health professions training. In contrast to the Administration's proposal for a single, omnibus reauthorization of all health professions authorities, which would permit maximum program flexibility to address current needs, the bill not only reauthorizes the existing plethora of narrow, categorical authorities, but also creates new programs. This approach to health professions training is outdated and fails to respond to the rapidly changing health care environment.

A more appropriate approach would recognize that the surplus of physicians has reduced the need for Federal financial assistance and would improve incentives for health professionals to locate in areas of the country where shortages exist. The Administration's health professions proposals would help meet these objectives.

S. 2574 would also repeal the Primary Care Block Grant authority—a key reform proposed by the Administration and enacted by the Congress in 1981 designed to restore State control, strengthen administrative efficiencies, and improve the delivery of health services. Thus, this bill would reverse a successful trend of increased State acceptance of health care responsibility that the Administration initiated. The block grant programs for preventive health and health services and alcohol and drug abuse have been successful. The primary care block grant was made optional by the Congress, and States have been hesitant to accept it. However, to close out the option at a time when States should be willing to consider another step toward greater autonomy is counterproductive and unacceptable.

This bill contains numerous other provisions that are either unnecessary or unacceptable, including authorization for new Federal National Health Service Corps scholarships that are not needed, since the number of scholarship recipients already bound to subsidized medical practice in rural areas is adequate.

For all these reasons, I find S. 2574 unacceptable.

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I am withholding my approval from S. 1967, a bill "To compensate the Gros Ventre and Assiniboine Tribes of the Fort Belknap Indian Community for irrigation construction expenditures."

S. 1967 would reimburse the Gros Ventre and Assiniboine Tribes of the Fort Belknap Indian Community for $107,759.58 in tribal funds expended under applicable law for the construction of irrigation projects on the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation from 1895 to 1913. In addition, interest would be paid at 4 percent from the date of expenditure of the tribal funds until the date of payment of the principal pursuant to the bill.

On November 20, 1962, the Indian Claims Commission, after due deliberation, issued a detailed opinion carefully considering and dismissing (among other claims) a claim for the same reimbursement that would be provided by the bill. Fort Belknap Indian Community v. United States, 11 Ind. Cl. Comm. 479, 510-518, 543-549 (1962). The Commission found that construction of the irrigation system was "requested by the members of the Fort Belknap Community," that it has been of great and continuing benefit to the tribes, and "that its construction and maintenance have been consonant with the fair and honorable dealings clause within the meaning of the Indian Claims Commission Act." 11 Ind. Cl. Comm. 518-519. The tribes took no appeal from that decision.

The fair and impartial administration of justice and the protection of public resources from meritless special appropriations both require that those who have availed themselves of judicial remedies in asserting claims against the United States, and have had their claims fully and fairly adjudicated under our Constitution and laws, receive no more or less than that to which they have been adjudged to be entitled. Twenty-two years after the claims of these two tribes were dismissed by an impartial tribunal established by the Congress specifically to adjudicate such claims, this bill would authorize and appropriate to them all that they were previously found not to be entitled to.

Under the circumstances, the enactment of the bill would set aside established principles of justice and thereby encourage other and future efforts to obtain by legislation that which has been denied by a just adjudication.

For these reasons, I find the bill unacceptable.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 17, 1984.

S. 607

I have withheld my approval from S. 607, the "Public Broadcasting Amendments Act of 1984."

This bill would authorize appropriations of $200 million, $225 million, and $250 million, respectively, for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989 for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. It would also authorize appropriations of $25 million, $35 million, and $40 million for the Public Telecommunications Facilities Program administered by the Department of Commerce for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987.

Public broadcasting has an important role to play in assuring that a wide variety of information and entertainment choices are made available to American viewers and listeners. Under S. 607, however, the authorizations for Federal subsidies to public broadcasting would increase dramatically. When all of the demands on the Federal budget are taken into account, I cannot endorse the levels of spending on public broadcasting contemplated by this legislation. They are incompatible with the clear and urgent need to reduce Federal spending.

It is important to note that current-year funding for these two programs totals only $174 million. The Oxley amendment would have resulted in a generous and barely affordable increase of 15 percent, to $200 million. S. 607 goes much further and raises first-year funding by 29 percent to $225 million for the two programs. By the third year under S. 607, combined funding would be $290 million, a 67 percent increase from the current budget year. Under present fiscal conditions, unrestrained increases of this magnitude—no matter how worthy the programs—are unacceptable.

Legislation that provides for Federal support of public broadcasting at realistic and reasonable levels and that provides public broadcasters with the means and incentives to explore alternative revenue sources would be both appropriate and welcome. If, however, we are to succeed in reducing Federal spending—as we must—the levels of spending contemplated by S. 607 cannot be justified.

In withholding my approval of S. 607, I want to emphasize that the continued operations of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting are not at risk. Funds for the Corporation have already been appropriated for 1985 and 1986, and funds for 1987 are contained in H.R. 6028, the Labor-Health and Human Services-Education 1985 appropriations bill, which recently passed both Houses of Congress.

I vetoed an earlier version of this legislation on August 29, 1984, for precisely the same reasons that I am withholding my approval of S. 607. I will continue to oppose and reject bills of this nature until and unless Congress presents me with a bill that is consistent with sound budget policy. This one is certainly not, and I decline to approve it.

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I have withheld my approval from S. 1097, the "National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Atmospheric and Oceanic Research and Services Act of 1984." S. 1097 would, among other things, authorize appropriations for various National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) programs for fiscal year 1985, for which appropriations have already been enacted.

S. 1097 also contains, however, a number of undesirable provisions that would unduly effect the ability of the Department of Commerce to manage its programs responsibly and effectively. The provisions in Title VI concerning the closings and consolidations of National Weather Service offices are particularly onerous and would have the effect of virtually precluding the consolidation or closing of such offices, even when such closings or consolidations are fully justified.

In addition, S. 1097 contains other highly objectionable provisions concerning the Department's activities. Section 205 of S. 1097 would result in excessive and unjustifiable delays in Department contracting-out activities, even when such contracting would be in the clear interest of the Nation's taxpayers. And, Section 202(b), which concerns the weather satellite program, is objectionable because it would lessen the Secretary of Commerce's discretion in managing that program, as well as require the inefficient use of a government asset.

This act represents an unwarranted intrusion by Congress into matters normally and properly within the management discretion of the Executive branch. In the interest of efficient and economical conduct of government activities, therefore, I am constrained to withhold my approval of S. 1097.

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I am withholding my approval of S. 2166, the "Indian Health Care Amendments of 1984," which would extend and amend the Indian Health Care Improvement Act.

Although I fully support the intent and objectives of the Indian Health Care Improvement Act, I believe this bill is seriously deficient in fulfilling those goals. My disapproval of the bill will in no way affect the continued delivery of health care services to our country's Indian population. Earlier this month I signed the Continuing Resolution Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1985, which includes $855 million for the Indian Health Service, an increase of $30 million over the prior year.

A number of serious flaws in S. 2166 compel my disapproval of this bill. Two provisions are especially troublesome.

First, a provision that I find totally unacceptable would actually reduce access to health services for Indians. That provision would have the effect of making Indians residing in Montana ineligible for certain benefits of State and locally supported health programs until and unless the availability of such benefits from the Indian Health Service has been exhausted. In my view, this provision for Indian citizens of Montana would set a precedent for potentially changing the fundamental relationship of the Indian Health Service to State and local entities, as well as depriving eligible Indians of benefits that should be due them by virtue of their citizenship in the State. As a matter of both principle and precedent, I cannot accept this provision.

Second, the mechanism established in section 602(d) of the bill for effecting the removal of the Indian Health Service from the Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA) is unconstitutional and can have no legal effect. The Department of Justice has advised me that the Congress may not constitutionally delegate to a congressionally appointed body, such as the Commission on the Organizational Placement of the Indian Health Service established by this bill, the legislative authority to determine when legislation will take effect. Because section 602(d) does not comply with the clear requirements of the Constitution, I cannot give my approval to this bill.

Other serious flaws in S. 2166 that compel my disapproval would:

—duplicate existing authorities in most of its provisions;

—unnecessarily and wastefully change the organization of the Indian Health Service; and —place increased emphasis on services that are not oriented toward the primary mission of the Indian Health Service.

The bill would allocate a significant portion of funding for various peripheral projects, such as unnecessary reports, interagency agreements, and regulations development. This would lead either to an unacceptable increase in total funding or to underfunding of the most critical area—provision of clinical health services to reservation Indians. The Administration has, on the other hand, proposed using most Indian health funds for this purpose, so that resources can be most effectively spent where the need is the greatest.

For all these reasons, I find S. 2166 unacceptable.

As I indicated earlier, the action I am taking will have no adverse impact on the delivery of health services to Indians living on or near a reservation because the existing provisions of the Snyder Act provide all necessary authority for such services. Since 1955, utilizing the Snyder Act authorities:

—30 hospitals have been constructed;

—30 clinics and 58 field health stations have been constructed;

—Annual admissions to Indian Health Service and contract hospitals have more than doubled; outpatient visits have multiplied by approximately eight times; and the number of dental services provided has increased ten-fold.

Even more important are the achievements in terms of improved health status, which is, after all, the goal of the Indian Health Service:

—The infant mortality rate has decreased by 77 percent and the maternal death rate by 86 percent;

—The death rate resulting from pneumonia and influenza has decreased by 73 percent; and —Death from tuberculosis has been reduced by 94 percent and the incidence of new active tuberculosis has been reduced by 84 percent.

Over the last decade, the Federal Government has supported the Indian Health Service with over $5 billion.

The last budget that I submitted to the Congress projected spending an additional $4 billion through 1989.

My Administration's commitment to ensuring the continuing improvement of health services delivery to Indian people and Alaska natives is strong and clear.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, and Mr. ANDREWS):

S. 213. A bill to provide State and local governments greater flexibility and self-determination in addressing how specific highway needs can best be met; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

PROVIDING STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS FLEXIBILITY IN USING HIGHWAY FUNDS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to provide State and local governments greater flexibility and self-determination in addressing their specific highway needs. This legislation is identical to a measure (S. 2738) I sponsored in the 98th Congress, together with Senators HOLLINGS and ANDREWS. I am pleased that they are again joining me as cosponsors of this proposal in the 99th Congress, and I invite my other Senate colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. President, one of the chief concerns State and local officials have voiced to me is that the States do not have sufficient flexibility to obligate their respective apportionments of Federal-aid highway funds in a manner that adequately addresses their most pressing highway needs. Under current law, funds authorized to be expended on the Federal-aid primary, secondary, and urban highway systems, and the so-called interstate 4-R work—interstate resurfacing, restoration, rehabilitation, and reconstruction—are apportioned among the States according to statutory formulas contained in 23 U.S.C. 104. While this same section does allow for some latitude in transferring funds from one system or category to another, such transfers are very limited and do not allow the States the flexibility they need.

This lack of flexibility affects all States to varying degrees, but the highway funding situation in my home State of South Carolina is especially illustrative of the general problem. In South Carolina, Mr. President, well over one-half of the estimated Federal-aid apportionments through fiscal year 1986 will be earmarked for interstate construction and 4-R work. In fact, expected funding for just the 4-R work on South Carolina's 772 miles of interstate highways is more than the combined total expected for both construction and 4-R work on the 6,737 miles of Federal-aid primary and urban systems. On a per-mile basis, the expected interstate 4-R funding is about nine times the expected total for both construction and 4-R work on the primary and urban systems.

The limited flexibility allowed under current law simply does not recognize nor address the fact that a substantial portion of the most pressing highway needs in South Carolina and other States are on the Federal-aid primary and urban systems. In many instances, the upgrading of Federal-aid primary and urban highways is more urgently needed than some 4-R work on the interstate system.

The legislation I am introducing today recognizes the reality that the Federal-aid apportionments for primary, secondary, and urban systems, and for 4-R work, do not always address the specific highway needs of each individual State. Under my bill, the Federal-aid highway apportionments of the States would be calculated in the same manner as provided for today. However, rather than funds being specifically earmarked for use on the Federal-aid primary, secondary, and urban systems, and for 4-R work, States would be free to allocate the total of their apportionments for all four of these categories among any one or all of these four categories as their individual needs require.

Mr. President, it has long been my belief that State and local officials are in a better position to know the needs of their citizens on matters of this nature than either the Congress or Federal bureaucrats in Washington. Whenever practicable, I believe it is best that the Federal Government defer to the judgment and decisions of State and local officials in allocating scarce financial resources among competing program needs within their jurisdiction.

Enactment of this legislation would be a step in that direction. It would give States and local governments greater flexibility and self-determination in addressing how their specific highway needs can best to met.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, in these early days of the 99th Congress, this body will bring before it many major bills, including those badly needed to reduce the deficit. One piece of legislation that must be given immediate consideration is the interstate cost estimate. Without this, over $7 billion in highway funds will continue to be kept in limbo, while necessary construction and repair work goes undone.

Apart from this important task, there is one revision to the Federal-aid highway program that I believe would improve it substantially. Specifically, this relates to the bill we are introducing today.

This legislation, which I am happy to cosponsor, would eliminate the restrictions on a State shifting Federal highway construction funds from one system into another, where there may be particular problems. Under current law, such a transfer is difficult if not impossible, limiting how each State uses its highway funds.

It should be noted that this legislation would not in any way change the manner in which the Federal Highway Administration allocates primary, secondary, urban, and interstate 4-R funds to the States. Therefore, there would be no reduction in the total amount of highway dollars available to each State. This legislation would only enhance the ability of our scarce Federal dollars to be directed to where they are most needed.

In the last Congress, the senior Senator from South Carolina and I introduced similar legislation, after consultations with the leadership in the South Carolina General Assembly and the Department of Highways and Public Works. This earlier proposal garnered some attention from interested parties, but no action was taken by the Senate. I am hopeful that this new year and new Congress will bring increased awareness of the merits of this legislation, and I urge its enactment.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. HOLLINGS):

S. 214. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, to proceed with the planning, designing, engineering, and construction of the Charleston Harbor deepening project; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CHARLESTON HARBOR DEEPENING PROJECT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, joined by my colleague from South Carolina, Senator HOLLINGS, I am today introducing legislation to authorize the deepening of Charleston Harbor in Charleston, SC. This important port project has been under study since before 1967. Phase I studies of the project were originally authorized by Congress in 1976; however, implementation was delayed pending reassessment of several older projects. Unfortunately, the Charleston Harbor deepening project has since been caught in the logjam which has developed over water resource legislation.

This legislation would deepen the channel of Charleston to a depth of 40 feet at a Federal cost of $76.1 million. The channel is currently authorized at a depth of 35 feet. This means that ships calling at the port must draw no more than 31 feet, in order to safely navigate the channel. In light of the large size of ships routinely plying the world's oceans and calling at American ports, it is important that our Nation not fall further behind in port development.

The Port of Charleston is a very significant component of our world trade posture. In 1981, customs revenue in Charleston was approximately $150 million. Maritime Administration figures for calendar year 1983 rank Charleston third in containerized cargo for the east and gulf coasts. It is ranked seventh nationally in this cargo volume category.

Charleston is a rapidly growing port, and, if this project is allowed to go forward, this growth will be even greater in the future. In addition, customs revenue receipts are expected to rise as a result of the greater volumes of cargo which will move through the port.

I would like to emphasize, Mr. President, that, by introducing this bill, I am not ignoring the need for comprehensive water resource legislation. It is my plan to continue to work diligently to secure passage of such a bill. I would strongly urge that the Charleston Harbor deepening project be authorized, either through enactment of my bill or through inclusion in a more comprehensive water project measure, during this Congress.

Provisions authorizing this particular project were contained in both H.R. 3678, the House omnibus water resource bill, as well as the Senate water resource bill, S. 1739, during the 98th Congress. This is an important, high-priority project, and I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting swift enactment of appropriate authorizing legislation.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, it gives me pleasure to join my senior colleague, Mr. THURMOND, in sponsoring the important bill we present today. Our bill will authorize the deepening of Charleston Harbor. Charleston is my hometown and I know first hand the need for this project. It's total cost is $76,100,000. This is an ongoing project, Mr. President, first under study in 1967. The initial studies associated with the project were authorized in 1976, but they have not been implemented for a number of reasons, chief among them the need to reassess several older projects. And, since those initial delays, additional problems have occurred with regard to delays in congressional approval of water resource legislation.

What we propose today, Mr. President, is to authorize the deepening of the Charleston channel to a depth of 40 feet. Present authorization permits a depth of only 35 feet. And, in order to safely navigate the channel ships now must draw a depth of no more than 31 feet. Without the additional depth provided by this project, Mr. President, Charleston Harbor will fall further and further behind, and an important resource for South Carolina, the region, and the Nation will be lost. We must obtain the additional depth if we are going to accommodate the larger and larger ships that are routinely, and increasingly, providing the bulk of the merchant marine capacity of the world.

My colleague has already presented an impressive set of statistics attesting to the fact that Charleston enjoys an impressive rank as a port of call for our Nation. And, just as significant is the rapid growth it has made. It's growth and future development mean much to the economic growth, not only of the region, but the entire Nation. With the additional depth we seek, we expect the rate of growth to increase even more dramatically in the future than we have witnessed in the past.

It's imperative that the Charleston Harbor deepening project be authorized, Mr. President, and the action we take today signals our intention to work persistently toward that goal. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in gaining swift approval of this bill.

By Mr. MELCHER:

S. 217. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make permanent the rules relating to imputed interest and assumption of loans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

IMPUTED INTEREST AND ASSUMPTION OF LOANS

● Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to permanently resolve the imputed interest rate problems created in the 1984 Tax Act.

We have some breathing room on the infliction of high imputed interest on seller-financed property sales—still a little more than 5 months until July 1, when time runs out on a legislated delay adopted by Congress. That delay blocks the high imputed rates required to go into effect January 1 by the 1984 Tax Act.

As the final days of Congress were slipping by last October, the Senate still had not taken action to correct the seller-financed property sales contained in the 1984 Tax Act.

At that time, there were two approaches available to us for corrective action. One would have repealed the 1984 provisions, leaving everyone where they were prior to enactment of that tax bill. This approach has the simplicity of leaving imputed interest law the same as it has been for the past 3 years.

The second approach was to pass amendments that were easily understood and workable, leaving assumable loans alone by not causing them to be renegotiated and imputed interest applied, and exempting the first $2 million of any seller-financed sales of homes, land and small business property. That is about what Congress finally agreed upon, but just until July 1 of this year when we must have a permanent law adopted.

Unless we change the 1984 tax law by July 1 there will be very few seller-financed property sales. That means that any estimate of revenue gained by the new 1984 Tax Act provisions on imputed interest rates likely would be greatly overestimated by the Treasury Department because it blithely assumes that the same historic level of seller-financed property sales will continue. That would not be the case under the 1984 law because it will be a very rare person indeed who will find it sensible to sell property on a contract that will make the seller liable for income tax based on imputed interest income that the seller has never received.

Sellers simply will not be able to finance sales on that kind of a basis. Buyers will have to find other types of financing that will doubtlessly result in higher interest, and if the buyers cannot afford to pay the higher interest, the sale just will not be made.

As surely as night follows day, the Treasury Department estimate of a revenue loss of $2.2 billion if the provision were repealed is a false estimate, more worthy of fiction than fact.

This bill corrects the imputed interest rate problems created by the 1984 Tax Act by providing for a simple two-tier approach to imputed interest rates similar to the one taken by the House of Representatives in temporary legislation passed last October.

The first tier applies to debt amounts up to $2 million. In these smaller property sales, the bill permits the seller to set the interest payments at 9 percent, which was the interest rate permitted prior to passage of the 1984 Tax Act. The bill also permits interest rates of less than 9 percent to be written into the contract should commercial interest rates drop substantially from current levels. An interest rate equal to 80 percent of Treasury rates may be used if that would result in a rate less than 9 percent.

If these requirements are not met in seller-financed property sales with debt of less than $2 million, then the Treasury is authorized to impute an interest rate to the seller-financer of 10 percent, or 100 percent of applicable Federal Treasury rates, whichever is lower.

The second tier deals with debt amounts above $2 million. For loan amounts exceeding $2 million the seller is permitted to write an interest rate equal to 80 of Treasury rates into the contract. If that requirement is not meant, then the Treasury Department is authorized to impute an interest rate to the seller equal to 100 percent of Federal rates.

Further, sellers are permitted to blend interest rates permitted for amounts under $2 million with the interest rates required for amounts over $2 million, so that in fact the test rate would never actually reach 80 percent of Treasury rates, nor would the imputed rate ever reach 100 percent of Treasury rates.

The bill contains language to insure that sales involving loan assumption are left as they were before the 1984 Tax Act. There was no specific language in the 1984 Tax Act on loan assumptions, but there was some language in the conference report which alluded to seller financing where loan assumptions were involved. The Treasury Department has stated that it believes that this is sufficient to give it authority to require that in deals where there is a loan assumption, the interest rates on the assumed loan must be increased to meet the new imputed interest rates in the 1984 Tax Act. This bill makes it clear that the new imputed interest rates are not to apply to existing loan assumptions.

Finally, the bill repeals a section of the 1984 Tax Act that took away the purchaser's right to deduct the full amount of any imputed interest that is deemed to have been paid to the seller. Prior to the 1984 Tax Act, if the seller were imputed an interest rate for tax purposes higher than the rate written into the contract, then the purchaser was permitted to take tax deductions for interest payments associated with the contract equal to the imputed rate. However, with the passage of the 1984 act, purchasers were limited to deducting the amount of interest stated in the contract, no matter what higher interest rate was deemed to be income to the seller—thus setting up an imbalance between the tax treatment of the seller and purchaser. I don't believe this is right, and this bill will restore tax neutrality to seller-financed transactions.

I believe that the simple two-tier system for imputed interest rates suggested by the House in its temporary provisions last fall makes sense. I have made that the basis of my bill and I hope that the Finance Committee will give it serious and early consideration this year so that we can get the imputed interest rate problem behind us and restore the usefulness of seller financing in the sales of real property.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full at this point as well as a section-by-section analysis.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(1) July 1, 1985, or
(2) the date of the enactment of this act.

IMPUTED INTEREST RATE BILL, SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

The first part of this bill establishes the test rates and imputed rates for two tiers of transactions:

A. For transactions where the loan amount does not exceed $2 million, the applicable test rate shall be 9 percent or 80 percent of applicable Federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) of the code, whichever is lower.

B. For transactions where the loan amount does not exceed $2 million, the applicable imputed rate shall be 10 percent or 100 percent of applicable Federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) of the code, whichever is lower.

C. For transactions where the loan amount exceeds $2 million, the applicable test rate shall be a blend of the rate under (A) above, and 80 percent of applicable Federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) for the loan amount in excess of $2 million.

D. For transactions where the loan amount exceeds $2 million, the applicable imputed rate shall be a blend of the rate under (B) above, and 100 percent of applicable Federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) for the loan amount in excess of $2 million.

E. All loan amounts from a single transaction or series of related transactions will be aggregated for purposes of determining loan amounts.

The second part of this bill prohibits the application of the original issue discount or imputed interest rules enacted in the 1984 Tax Act in cases of loan assumptions.

The third part of this bill repeals Section 1275(b) of the Internal Revenue Code. Section 1275(b) of the Code, which was added by the 1984 Tax Act, limits the amount of interest expense a purchaser of personal use property may deduct for tax purposes to the amount actually written in the sales contract, even though a higher interest rate for tax purposes is imputed to the seller. Prior to the 1984 Tax Act, the purchaser was permitted to deduct the full amount of imputed interest for tax purposes.

The last portion of this bill makes needed conforming amendments because of the interrelation of sections of the Code dealing with Original Issue Discount rules and Imputed Interest Rate rules.●

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 231. A bill to establish a National Commission on Neurofibromatosis; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON NEUROFIBROMATOSIS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation to establish a National Commission on Neurofibromatosis.

Neurofibromatosis [NF] is the most common neurological genetic disorder, affecting an estimated 100,000 people in the United States. It is estimated that 1 in 3,000 people have this progressive genetic disorder which results in abnormal development of neural tumors. The disease usually appears in childhood, although it can appear as late as age 50, with the following progressive symptoms: Small and large pressure sensitive tumors just under the skin, severe curvature of the spine, enlargement and deformation of bones, tumors on the auditory nerves resulting in deafness, tumors on the optic nerve resulting in loss of sight, and tumors of the brain and spinal cord, frequently resulting in epilepsy, retardation and death. In approximately 5 percent of the cases, the tumors become cancerous.

Research has determined that NF is inherited from one parent in about 50 percent of the cases. The other cases, however, are caused by a sporadic mutation of the genes. To date almost nothing is known about the causes of this mutation, and there is no effective treatment for NF other than surgical intervention in the growth of the tumors, which may grow back.

NATIONAL COMMISSION

Despite the prevalence of the disease, NF is perhaps the most overlooked serious disorder of our time. Recently, attention has been focused on NF as a result of the theatrical and motion picture productions of "The Elephant Man," the true story of John Merrick's struggle with the most severe case of NF ever recorded. That attention, however, will not replace the needed coordination and focus of our research efforts provided by a national commission.

Mr. President, the legislation being introduced today would establish an independent commission of 20 members, organized, operating and reporting within a 24-month period, with an authorization of $1 million. The Commission is to prepare a comprehensive plan for research and education on NF and the needed services for people with NF and their families. There is currently research going on within the National Institutes of Health and at other institutions across the country. But the coordination and funding for this research is severely lacking. A commission is needed to coordinate the work done so far and to plan for needed future research. As we have done with other major diseases, we need to formulate a national policy for dealing with NF.

I believe a national commission is a necessary step in our battle against NF, and I therefore encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.

By Mr. PRYOR:

S. 232. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to add a new subsection dealing with exchanges and rentals of names from donor lists of membership lists; to the Committee on Finance.

RENTALS OF NAMES FROM DONOR LISTS OR MEMBERSHIP LISTS

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today I'm introducing a bill that will correct a misinterpretation of the so-called unrelated business income provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. I believe most Members of the Senate are familiar with this issue. It deals with whether or not a tax-exempt organization—like the Disabled American Veterans, Red Cross, and so forth—is taxable on money received from the rental of a mailing list, or when they exchange lists with another tax-exempt entity.

The provisions in the Tax Code dealing with unrelated business income are there for a good reason, Mr. President. They operate to tax an otherwise tax-exempt entity when it engages in an activity "unrelated" to its charitable purpose. The reason is clear—if the organization is essentially competing with private companies, which are taxable, then in order to prevent the charity from having an advantage, it should be treated as a taxable entity on that specific activity. Under section 513(a) of the Internal Revenue Code an unrelated trade or business of a tax-exempt entity is defined as: "any trade or business the conduct of which is not substantially related to the exercise or performance by such organization of its charitable, educational, religious, or other nonprofit purpose and function constituting the basis for its exemption."

With regard to mailing lists, the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] and the Court of Claims—in the 1981 case of Disabled American Veterans v. United States, 650 F.2d 1128—have ruled that the sale, rental, or exchange of a mailing list is not "substantially related" to the organization's charitable function, and therefore, taxable under the UBTI provisions.

It's my belief, Mr. President, that this result is not what Congress intended in enacting these provisions. Therefore, the bill I'm introducing today would provide that tax-exempt entities—contributions to which are tax-deductible under section 170—don't have income on the rental or exchange of their mailing lists. The bill doesn't cover the sale of a list.

Mr. President, the bill is similar to S. 825, introduced by the Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN, and the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WALLOP, in the last Congress. Also, it's similar to an amendment I offered to the tax bill last year, which was adopted by the Senate, but dropped in conference with the House. A similar bill is being introduced this week in the House by the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. DUNCAN of Tennessee.

Mr. President, most nonprofit organizations in this country rely, to a great extent, on contributions for their very existence. The most effective way to have a steady stream of contributions, so the organization can carry out its important work, is through an up-to-date mailing list.

Since the maintenance of a good mailing list is of critical importance, and since there is a certain rate of attrition among donors, it is essential that these organizations be allowed to exchange lists, and rent lists to each other, without incurring tax liability under the UBTI provisions. The exchange and rental of the lists isn't done to make money—it's done to keep an up-to-date list for continued fundraising. As such, I don't know how these activities could be anything but "substantially related" to the ongoing activities of the charity.

Further, Mr. President, I'm told by the Disabled American Veterans that many commercial mailers don't object to this bill. Since the effect on the private sector mailers is frequently given as an argument against this measure, I think their position needs to be noted in this debate.

Mr. President, the bill is simple: It's very important to many tax-exempt entities; and I think it will reverse what I believe to be an incorrect result. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this measure and join me in this effort, and I hope we can have this measure enacted in the near future.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) Section 513 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to unrelated trade or business) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) EXCHANGES AND RENTALS OF NAMES FROM DONOR LISTS OR MEMBERSHIP LISTS.—In the case of an organization described in section 501 contributions to which are deductible under section 170, the term 'unrelated trade or business' does not include any trade or business of such an organization which consists of exchanging or renting names and addresses of donors to, or members of, such organization."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years ending after the date of the enactment of this Act.

S. 233. A bill to provide for the minting of coins in commemoration of the centennial of the Statue of Liberty; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

STATUE OF LIBERTY—ELLIS ISLAND COMMEMORATIVE COIN ACT

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to authorize the minting of coins to commemorate the centennial of the Statue of Liberty.

It was 99 years ago that France presented the Statue of Liberty to the United States as a gift in celebration of our centenial. In 1886, this gift represented an astounding technological achievement and was symbolic of the founding principles of the United States.

For millions of people seeking freedom from oppression, freedom of opportunity, and/or freedom from want, the first sight of America was the Statue of Liberty. Their first steps on American soil were at the National Immigration Center on Ellis Island near the Statue of Liberty. For my relatives coming over from Italy, the view of the Statue of Liberty and the passage through the Ellis Island Immigration Center were memories that fanned the flames of freedom.

Today, 99 years later, another astounding technological achievement is taking place as the Statue of Liberty is being restored. This project is planned for completion in time for Lady Liberty's 100th birthday. Incidentally, the rehabilitation is being financed solely with private funds.

My legislation will require the minting of three different coins; a $5 piece, $1 piece, and a half-dollar piece. The $5 coin will represent the Statue of Liberty. The $1 coin will be emblematic of Ellis Island, and the half-dollar will highlight the important contribution made by America's immigrants.

My legislation would require the Secretary of the Treasury to mint up to 500,000 commemorative Statue of Liberty coins in 1986 with a face value of $5 each. The bill would also require the Secretary of the Treasury to mint up to 10 million $1 pieces commemorating Ellis Island and 25 million half-dollar pieces celebrating the achievements of America's immigrants. The coins may be minted as early as October 1, 1985, but not later than December 31, 1986.

Mr. President, the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island are two of the greatest treasures of our Nation. The private sector is seeing to it that the Statue of Liberty is restored to its original beauty. My bill assures that, through the issuance of commemorative coins, Lady Liberty's birthday will never be forgotten.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 234. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to make the trade laws more equitable and to expand trade; to the Committee on Finance.

TRADE EXPANSION ACT OF 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce a bill entitled "the Trade Expansion Act of 1985" on behalf of myself and my colleagues Senator CHAFEE and Senator SYMMS.

The Trade Expansion Act of 1985 presents a positive trade agenda for action by the 99th Congress.

This new trade agenda is offered as a constructive alternative to the kinds of trade proposals that occupied much of the time of the 98th Congress: Proposals to inject protectionism into our trade laws and policies; to turn the Congress into a court of appeals in trade cases; to require or imply product-by-product reciprocity in trade negotiations or to unilaterally establish new trade laws. Such proposals were intended to make trade more equitable. But they would also have jeopardized trade expansion. These kinds of remedies to our trade problems would have put at risk the enormous benefits from trade that this country has gained since the system of multilateral trade relations was established after World War II.

The Trade Expansion Act of 1985, on the other hand, is a comprehensive trade program to promote both equitable and expanding trade. Proposals were considered for this package only if they were in accordance with our international commitments under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and only if they strengthened, rather than weakened, the international trading system. Within these parameters, ideas were considered which would encourage trade expansion and provide more domestic and international control over unfair trade practices.

This bill consists of four titles. Title I concerns new multilateral trade negotiations. Title II establishes a new program for retraining workers to facilitate adjustment to import competition. Title III relates to adjustment of an industry and its workers during a period of import relief. Title IV includes changes in our domestic trade laws which would strengthen their enforcement, while at the same time avoiding procedural protectionism.

Let me provide a little more detail on the purpose and contents of each title.

TITLE I

The bill begins with a sense of the Senate resolution encouraging the President to proceed with the effort to get new multilateral trade negotiations underway. In essence, this resolution provides a congressional endorsement for the idea of a new round of trade negotiations, reaffirming Congress' commitment to the longstanding U.S. position in favor of an open trading system. It suggests a number of issues as central to new negotiations: safeguards and dispute settlement procedures in the GATT, rules for trade in agriculture, expanding the GATT to cover trade in services, intellectual property rights and trade in counterfeit goods and new efforts to strengthen the existing GATT codes on subsidies, technical barriers to trade, and Government procurement.

In today's world economy characterized by rapid and constant change—the appearance of new products and services and rapidly shifting comparative advantage between countries, international trade agreements, both tariff and nontariff quickly become outdated. For example, the United States may agree to a balanced trade deal, obtaining concessions equal to those it gives; but the emergence of new products can lessen the value of past concessions by our trading partners and unbalance the agreements. This is why static trade agreements become unfair giving rise to protectionist pressures.

The answer to this dilemma is not to abandon U.S. leadership of the multilateral trading system by enacting new import restrictions or unilateral trade laws. The resolution in title I is based on the view that the rapid pace of economic change argues instead for a strong U.S. commitment to a dynamic multilateral negotiating process. This is the way to assure that we receive reciprocal benefits for our trade concessions. It is the best way to create jobs through trade expansion.

The trading system will work better if countries have the political will to make it work. With title I of this bill, we seek to build the political will in this country that can provide new impetus for strengthening the trading system.

TITLE II—RETRAINING

Title II of this bill recognizes that there are costs to continued U.S. support for an open trading system. Clearly most individuals in this country will gain from trade, but there will be losers—individuals whose jobs will be lost to import competition. This is an issue that cannot be ignored in the development of a comprehensive trade program based on a liberal trade policy.

Thus, title II of this bill establishes new mechanisms to encourage adjustment of individuals adversely affected by import competition. Title II would replace the present Trade Adjustment Assistant Program with a new program which emphasizes retraining assistance. Under this program, which is tied into the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA], eligible individuals would be given job retraining vouchers redeemable for training. Individuals would have a wider choice of training options in the private sector than are provided now under the JTPA.

A novel approach would be taken to funding this new trade adjustment program. Implementation of the program would be linked to international negotiations to add a provision to the GATT giving countries the right to assess a small fee on imports to finance adjustment programs. Upon completion of such negotiations, the United States would initiate such an adjustment fee to finance the job vouchers. This adjustment fee would be a small cost to trading nations to keep trade open and expanding. In effect, it would be a users fee for trade—those who benefit from trade would pay for the costs of trade.

TITLE III—IMPORT RELIEF

Even with general policies in favor of an open trading system, there will be times when trade protection can be useful temporarily to promote the adjustment of an industry to import competition. Title III of this bill includes a number of provisions concerning the granting of import relief under the so-called escape clause. Granting trade protection is a serious decision and it creates substantial costs to our economy and to each citizen. The key message of this title of the bill is that the public deserves to get the adjustment it expects from an industry receiving import relief.

Title III includes a new requirement that industries and workers receiving import protection provide a quid pro quo for the import relief. Under this provision, the President would report on the nature of the quid pro quo when he notifies the Congress of his intention to provide import protection. To aid the President in his negotiation of this quid pro quo, another provision in this title requires the International Trade Commission to describe all the factors affecting an industry's competitive performance in its report to the President in an import relief case.

Two additional provisions are intended to provide for better public assessment of the costs and benefits of restricting trade in particular import relief cases. One would require the International Trade Commission to estimate the costs to consumers of any import restrictions it proposes. The second would require the Commission to hold a hearing at the end of an import relief period to encourage public discussion of the effectiveness of the import relief in facilitating adjustment to import competition.

TITLE IV

The last area covered in the new trade agenda proposed in this bill is the unfair trade laws. This bill does not, however, call for drastic unilateral trade law changes. Such unilateral changes would not promote trade expansion, but rather trade contraction. It should be remembered that one reason why our unfair trade laws can operate today without risking retaliation by others is because our domestic trade laws are drawn from internationally agreed standards and procedures. The best way to pursue major new trade law approaches is, therefore, through multilateral negotiations as proposed in title I of this bill.

Thus, title IV of the bill involves adjustments to current unfair trade law rather than drastic reforms. These changes to the countervailing duty and antidumping statutes close loopholes, reduce costs and thereby improve the access of small business, reduce administrative burdens on the International Trade Commission and help avoid the appearance of procedural protectionism.

The unprecedented number of petitions filed with the Department of Commerce is evidence that domestic industries believe that, even without drastic reform, our trade laws now provide an effective and worthwhile remedy. Nevertheless, it has been 4 years since the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act of 1979. Experience has shown areas in need of adjustment and fine timing.

I would emphasize two key points about these trade law changes.

First, they are intended to provide for rigorous and swift enforcement of our laws against unfair trade. One change, the elimination of appeals to the Court of International Trade, would take 1 to 3 years off the time in which the final outcome of a case would remain in question. Another, the creation of a second track for filing of trade cases, wold significantly shorten the time required before countervailing or antidumping duties could be assessed in affirmative cases.

Second, some changes are intended to address an increasing perception abroad that our laws are becoming a form of procedural protectionism. Such a perception is dangerous because it could encourage others to implement new forms of procedural protectionism against U.S. exports. One provision related to this issue would assure that the United States lives up to its international commitment to consider the link between the unfair trade practice and material injury in a domestic industry in antidumping and countervailing duty cases. Another would require any executive settlement of cases to precede the International Trade Commission vote, in order to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest within the Commission.

Another would require any executive settlement of cases to precede the International Trade Commission vote, in order to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest within the Commission.

Our trade laws must not only be perceived as equitable here at home. They must also be seen as equitable abroad because if they are not, in either case, the basis for trade expansion will be eroded.

Moving back to the general purpose of this bill, in closing I would note that with the trade deficit now at an unprecedented high, pressures for trade protection may be even greater in the 99th Congress than they were in the 98th Congress.

It is not enough for those of us who reject protectionism to take only a defensive position. I think it is critical for those who support an open trading system to develop a clear alternative for addressing our trade problems. This bill is an attempt to begin to specify a protrade legislative initiative.

Looking at this proposal in isolation some may say that it is not a sufficient alternative answer to the trade deficit because it does not address macroeconomic issues. Macroeconomic issues that may affect the trade deficit, however, will be dealt with in other legislative proposals this year on deficit reduction. The purpose of this bill is to compliment actions in other areas which affect our trade performance, with forward-looking legislative proposal on trade policy itself.

The importance of containing protectionism and moving forward on trade policy should not be underestimated as a response to the trade deficit. Protectionism in this country would surely stymie world economic recovery and world economic recovery is the real key to substantially narrowing our trade deficit.

World economic recovery would shift each of the factors now chiefly responsible for the trade deficit: the high value of the dollar, reduced exports to LDC debtor countries and our superior economic performance compared to our developed country trading partners. Better economic performance abroad would encourage foreigners to keep more of their capital in their own countries, and thus lower the value of the dollar by lowering the demand for dollars for investment in this country. It would help revive LDC markets for U.S. exports and increase our sales to developed countries as well. Thus, while this bill may be complemented by other legislative actions beyond the trade area itself I do see this initiative in the trade area as critical to narrowing the trade deficit.

One last point. It is my hope, and that of the bill cosponsors, that the Trade Expansion Act of 1985 will be a catalyst for congressional action on a constructive trade agenda. We see the proposals in this bill as the core for such an agenda. We would welcome additional ideas that support this effect to shift the Congress' trade debate in a more positive direction.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, this session of Congress begins not long after the announcement of the largest trade deficit in this Nation's history.

Once again, Congress will be besieged by protectionist pressures from import-competing industries. It would be a mistake, however, to let these interests completely capture our trade agenda.

We need to explore alternative approaches to our trade problems, approaches which will better serve consumers, the long-term interests of workers and the economy as a whole. The Trade Expansion Act of 1985, which I join in introducing today, is just such a positive approach.

The major trade agenda this year should be "new multilateral trade negotiations." Efforts are now underway in the administration for a new negotiating round. It is time for Congress to get involved in that process.

Title I of this proposed legislation provides a congressional endorsement for the idea of a new round reaffirming Congress' commitment to the longstanding U.S. position in favor of an open trading system, symbolized by the GATT. With present-day pressures on the international trading system, GATT is frequently bypassed or ignored as countries unilaterally, bilaterally, or in small groups take actions that violate its spirit and substance. It would be dangerous folly for the world trading nations to abandon the single multilateral institution which continues to enjoy legitimacy in the eyes of a diverse membership.

A new round of trade negotiations will provide us with the broad-based, universal consensus which is desperately required to help move both the West and the newly industrialized countries toward a new era of robust economic growth.

I would welcome Senate hearings to help identify U.S. objectives in new negotiations and ways to encourage more active involvement of other countries in preparation for a new round.

Title II of the Trade Expansion Act of 1985 deals with another important aspect of open trade. Open markets serve America in very tangible ways. Unfettered trade gives consumers access to a greater variety of products at lower prices. Trade forces domestic industries to adjust to changing technology before they become hopelessly inefficient. Perhaps most important, trade is the primary source of hope for the world's poor, increasing their stake in a stable world order.

But the advantages of open trade apply to the economy, generally while specific sectors can suffer greatly. Some workers, laid off because of competing imports, have no reason to rejoice over cheap, high-quality steel coming from Korea, or sweaters from Hong Kong. To try to offset this sacrifice, we instituted the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program in the 1960's. It has certainly had its critics, largely because it has meant more assistance than adjustment—cash payments rather than long-term training to enable workers in affected industries to begin afresh with new skills.

Title II would replace the present Trade Adjustment Assistance Program with a new program which emphasizes retraining assistance. This proposal is based on the view that if the United States is going to continue to support a liberal trade policy, it is important to facilitate the adjustment of those individuals adversely affected by import competition.

This program would shift the focus away from simply compensating workers to providing them with real future alternatives. And it would do so in a fashion that is consistent with our current efforts to trim Federal spending. This program, which is linked with the Job Training Partnership Act [JTPA], would provide eligible individuals with job retraining vouchers redeemable for training. The implementation of this new program would be linked to negotiations which would add a provision to the GATT giving countries the right to assess a very small fee on imports in order to finance adjustment programs. Only upon completion of such negotiations would the United States institute such a fee to finance the job vouchers.

Title III includes a number of provisions concerning the granting of relief under the so-called escape clause of the Trade Act of 1974. One such provision would amend the trade laws to require industries that obtain import relief under section 201 to adopt plans for their own competitive revitalization. Current law does not adequately address the issue of structural adjustment, although an industry's ultimate survival depends upon its use of the respite granted under the trade laws to become competitive.

By linking an industry's import relief to its domestic structural adjustment, we could help insure that the industry and the economy ultimately will become more competitive.

Another provision concerns the cost of import protection to consumers. In 1980, roughly 20 percent of manufactured goods consumed by Americans were covered by some kind of import restriction. Economists at Washington University in St. Louis estimated that these restrictions cost consumers $58.5 billion in 1980 alone—a hidden tax of about $1,200 a year for the average family of four. By now, I am certain the cost is even greater. Consumers for World Trade estimates it now to be $2,000 per family per year. CBO has documented how much more steel consumers would pay for steel import quotas, and Brookings economists have analyzed the enormous costs of the voluntary restraint on Japanese automobiles.

Yet nowhere do we require that the President be provided an assessment of the costs of import relief to the consumer and to the economy as whole before he decides to grant import relief. This legislation would instruct the ITC to determine these costs and report them to the President along with its section 201 finding of injury and remedy recommendation.

Finally, title IV would clarify congressional intent concerning the relationship between subsidies, dumping, and the injury caused thereby, and would otherwise fine-tune some sections of the Trade Agreements Act of 1979.

I urge the support of my colleagues for this legislation.●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. DENTON, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 235. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to prohibit employment in civil service positions in the executive branch of any individual required to register under the Military Selective Service Act who has not so registered; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TO PROHIBIT EMPLOYMENT IN CIVIL SERVICE POSITIONS IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THOSE WHO HAVE NOT REGISTERED FOR THE DRAFT AND ARE REQUESTED TO DO SO

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to prohibit the employment, in any executive agency of the U.S. Government, of any individual required to register under section 3 of the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 453) who has not so registered. Simply put, this legislation would make any one who is required by law to register for the draft that has not registered, ineligible for a civil service job.

Mr. President, under current law, every male citizen and resident alien between the ages of 18 and 26 is required to register for the draft. Registration is a simple process generally requiring less than 5 minutes of an individual's time. In addition, forms are readily available at any of the more than 34,000 post offices across the country.

In registering, individuals not only comply with the law, but also acknowledge their acceptance of the basic responsibilities of our free society and aid in the furtherance of an important part of our defense preparedness. We can take pride in the fact that approximately 98 percent of those required to register have done so thereby signifying their recognition that the freedoms we enjoy are not without accompanying obligations.

Unfortunately, a small minority of individuals have chosen to disregard and violate our Selective Service laws. These individuals have refused to accept or even acknowledge that they have any responsibility to serve their country in a time of need. Failure to register is, of course, a criminal violation of the laws of the United States, and those who irresponsibly violate the Selective Service statutes should not be allowed the benefits of a civil service job. Federal employees are paid by the taxpayers, and it is only fair that any one desiring to obtain employment in a Government agency comply with our selective service laws.

While these lawbreakers are presently ineligible for any form of Federal educational assistance or benefit, such as educational grants, loans or work study to which they would otherwise be entitled under title IV of the Higher Education Act, there are no statutory provisions making them ineligible for employment in a Federal executive agency. This is particularly appalling when one considers that the possibility exists that a nonregistrant could obtain employment ahead of a veteran.

Enactment of the legislation I am introducing today would put just such a law on the books. This is a good bill, and one that enjoys the support of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. I commend this measure to my colleagues in the Senate, and invite them to join me in working toward its early enactment.

By Mr. SPECTER (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. COHEN, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 236. A bill to amend the Unfair Competition Act of 1916 and Clayton Act to provide for further relief in the event of unfair foreign competition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

UNFAIR FOREIGN COMPETITION ACT OF 1985

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Unfair Foreign Competition Act to put teeth into our existing antidumping laws by granting American industries direct access to Federal courts to promptly halt dumping, to obtain compensation for the injury suffered as a result of the illegal imports, and to deter future illigitimate incursions into U.S. markets.

This legislation will accomplish several essential objectives the current regulatory scheme fails to achieve.

It provides a mechanism for halting illegal dumping within a matter of days, instead of the months or years ITC proceedings and Presidential review can consume; it compensates injured businesses so they can begin to recapture markets illegally taken by foreign imports; it takes ill-gotten profits away from "dumpers" so as to remove their economic incentive for dumping and more effectively deter others from attempting illegal importing; and it rescues struggling industries from the political winds that too often hinder effective, strong-willed government enforcement of fair trade laws.

The beauty of this bill is that it greatly enhances the likelihood that unfair trade will cease without imposing any additional "protective" barriers. It simply makes the existing laws work.

This legislation was originally introduced on March 4, 1982, and hearings were held before the Judiciary Committee. This bill was offered in modified form as an amendment to the gas tax bill in conjunction with the "Buy America" amendment. These two provisions were narrowly tabled by a 51-to-47 vote. This bill was reintroduced in the 98th Congress as S. 418 and additional hearings were held.

This legislation will provide a valuable mechanism for any industry to ensure that free trade is fair trade, but it will be particularly critical for the steel industry.

The evidence is plain that enormous quantities of very heavily subsidized steel are coming into the United States. That fact has been disclosed in a series of proceedings before the International Trade Commission. State-owned firms including nationalized firms in Italy, France, the United Kingdom, and Belgium accounted for at least 62 percent of the European Community steel production in 1983. Over half of the major steel firms in other Western developed countries are state owned. These firms are located in Spain, Austria, Finland, and Yugoslavia. They accounted for 37.6 million net tons or 69 percent of the non-EEC Western country production during 1983.

As a result of this influx in dumping and subsidized steel, Mr. President, almost half of the 457,000 American steelworkers employed in 1975 have since lost their jobs. The situation of the steel industry has gotten worse in recent months. Third-quarter and expected fourth-quarter results for 1984 show significant losses after two break-even quarters following 2 years of huge losses. The credit ratings of three major companies have been downgraded within the last few months below investment grade, which means those companies cannot borrow. All major firms have suffered lower credit ratings since 1981.

The worsening condition of domestic steel results directly from sharp increases in imports. At 15 percent of U.S. sales in 1979, imports rose to 20 percent in 1983, 30 percent for the month of November 1984, and are expected to be at 27 percent for 1984 overall.

Mr. President, these imports are threatening the American steel industry, which is vital to our national welfare. Domestic production is vital because once we find the American steel industry going down the drain and our reliance is solely on imported steel, then we will be at risk of being victimized as we were victimized by OPEC oil exporters. For too long, our trade policies have been dictated by what some may conceive to be in the interest of foreign policy, and American industries one after another, as I see it, have been sacrificed on the alter of foreign policy.

The failure of the current processes to ensure fair trade is nowhere more evident then in the disappointing results of our sincere efforts to negotiate voluntary trade restraint agreements to reduce foreign imports to about 18.5 percent. In July 1984, the International Trade Commission recommended that the President impose a combination of tariffs and quotas on 70 percent of imported steel because of extensive dumping by a number of foreign companies. Unfortunately, the President did not accept these recommendations. Instead, he instructed the U.S. Trade Representative, Ambassador Brock, to negotiate voluntary restraint agreements with a number of foreign governments.

On December 17, 1984, I learned that the Republic of Korea was not cooperating with Mr. Brock in concluding a voluntary restraint agreement. I, therefore, wrote a letter to Ambassador Lew urging Korea to reach accommodation on this important issue.

On December 18, 1984, Mr. Brock announced the conclusion of the steel negotiations with seven countries which included Korea. These agreements, however, failed to reduce imports to 18.5 percent and also lacked import details of category breakdown of products for both Japan and Korea.

In view of Mr. Brock's trip in mid-January to Korea and Japan to work out the details of categories, I wrote the Ambassadors of both Japan and Korea on January 4, 1985, urging them to reach agreement with Mr. Brock on this important issue. I also noted in my letter that legislation was introduced, of which I was an original cosponsor, legislating 26 categories with specific totals for both Japan and Korea.

I am hopeful that these details will be worked out, but even if agreement is reached, the voluntary restraint agreements do not go far enough. I wrote to Mr. Brock, again, at the end of December, alerting him of my concern that Canada, the second largest exporter, has not been required to enter into a voluntary restraint agreement. Moreover, nations such as Sweden, Austria, Venezuela, Taiwan, and several Eastern European countries must enter into agreements. Otherwise, the President's global program of import reduction will be ineffective.

Furthermore, I believe that countries such as the People's Republic of China and India must be monitored closely due to the growth of large ultramodern government-subsidized steel plants. I have inspected truly impressive mills with massive unloading, construction, and storage facilities in Taiwan and the PRC. These countries have, or will have, the potential to flood the U.S. market with cheap subsidized steel if they remain unchecked.

This is why I am reintroducing this bill.

Ambassador Brock has been an effective negotiator on the United States' behalf, having successfully concluded several voluntary restraint agreements as of this date. The entire process of investigation, administrative litigation, and negotiation, however, has confirmed the existence of a fundamental flaw in our system for combating dumping. This flaw is the almost total lack of a deterrent element.

Section 101 would supply the necessary deterrent in two ways. First, by making injunctive relief available to injured U.S. companies, the UFCA would place foreign "dumpers" on notice that any investment in dumping in the United States could be lost instantaneously, since U.S. courts would be empowered to prohibit further sales in appropriate circumstances.

Under this bill, an injured domestic business could, immediately upon learning of the illegal dumping, go to the U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia and ask for a "temporary restraining order" [TRO] to immediately halt the imports and sales.

Thus, illegal dumping could be halted within days of its discovery, rather than the months or years it takes in the administrative maize. The temporary restraining order can then be modified to provide a more permanent halt after a more detailed finding.

It is a realistic approach to have injunctive relief granted to stop such subsidies and such dumping. The case of Marathon against Mobil Oil is illustrative of the point. That complex litigation was decided in the course of 6 weeks in the U.S. District Court in Cleveland. I have had substantial experience in civil litigation and can personally attest that when one of these cases is brought and the facts can be ascertained—for which purpose discovery is available—motions can be made for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction and can be granted in a manner of a few weeks at most. Once an injunction is granted, that would stop the importation of subsidized or dumped steel. If someone wants to take an appeal, he or she can do so, but the injunction stays unless reversed, so it is an effective remedy.

Unlike the proceedings before the International Trade Commission, which takes months and years and induce a surge of steel, this injunctive relief would be highly effective.

Second, by making damages available to U.S. companies if dumping and injury are ultimately found to have occurred, the UFCA will remove the illegally obtained profits and increase the cost of dumping. Foreign enterprises would be made aware that, like any domestic company, they will be held responsible for the economic consequences of their anticompetitive actions.

They would be forced to figure this potential cost into their calculations, and would be much more likely to conclude it is not an economically sound decision to attempt illegal dumping in the United States.

In contrast, the current regulatory scheme rarely imposes retroactive duties and, instead, merely restricts future dumping. The illegal dumper walks away with all the profits made through this unfair competition over the months or years it took to halt their action. Is it any wonder they immediately begin to plan their next incursion into American markets?

It is my view that as a matter of urgent necessity, the Congress should act to provide that imported steel should not come into this country where the evidence shows it is dumped or subsidized and there ought to be a remedy by having jurisdiction conferred on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to consider such evidence and to order the injunctive relief. It has long been the law of the United States, Mr. President, that subsidized goods and dumping are illegal but there is no effective remedy presently on the books.

Where the laws of the United States prohibit dumping and prohibit subsidy, those laws ought to be enforced. The way to get enforcement is through the courts. Minority groups have achieved justice in the courts—blacks, women, Hispanics. If American industry is to receive justice, it is going to be in the courts as well.

When individuals oppose the restriction of imports on the grounds of free trade, they overlook a very fundamental fact that a great deal of the imports, steel, cement, copper, and many other products are being brought into the United States as a result of subsidies or as a result of dumping. Free trade means fair trade and fair trade is the absence of subsidy and dumping. It is a misnomer to say that we are enforcing a policy of free trade when we permit this very heavy subsidization and dumping to take place in the United States.

Mr. President, an issue has been raised in former discussions on this matter as to whether this legislation violates GATT. There is an opinion of counsel by Peter D. Ehrenhaft, submitted to me on August 24, 1982, and I ask unanimous consent that the full text of his opinion be printed in the RECORD, together with the full text of the prior letter which he had written to Senator Ribicoff, dated March 13, 1980, establishing the legality of such a remedy under GATT.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUGHES HUBBARD & REED,
Washington, DC, August 24, 1982.

Re S. 2167.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: Thank you for your letter inviting me to provide you with an opinion concerning the consistency of S. 2167 with the GATT and the Antidumping Code. I am sorry I have been unable to respond earlier, but I have been out of my office for a number of weeks since I spoke with Mr. Finkel.

My views on this subject remain consistent with those expressed in the enclosed copy of a letter submitted to Senator Ribicoff when the latter chaired the Trade Subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee during the last Congress.[1] It is, in brief, my opinion that:

1. The GATT and Code do not preempt a private remedy.

A "single damage" statute, such as the one you are now proposing, cannot be "preempted by," nor be regarded as violative of, either the GATT or the Antidumping Code. On the issue of dumping, the GATT refers solely to the actions of governments imposing "antidumping duties." The Code provides procedures and certain substantive rules for the invocation of this governmental action. But neither the GATT nor the Code deals with private remedies, pursued in ordinary law courts, seeking redress for past injuries caused by other private parties through behavior that may also be "dumping" at which duties may be aimed in the future. This judgment is, by the way, echoed in a recent article by Senator Danforth's former Trade Counsel, Kermit Almstedt. See, "International Price Discrimination and the 1916 Antidumping Act—Are Amendments in Order," 13 Law & Pol. Int. Bus. 747, 779 (1981). (I am also enclosing the last four pages of that article in which this issue is discussed.)[2]

2. Article 16 of the Code is irrelevant.

The Administration has recently pointed specifically to Article 16, § 1 of the Antidumping Code as precluding a measure such as S. 2167. That section provides:

"No specific action against dumping of exports from another party can be taken except in accordance with the provisions of the General Agreement, as interpreted by this Agreement."

However, this section does not bar private damage actions. Its purpose is to prevent other governmental action against dumped imports—such as cease and desist orders—and to assure that investigations and actions are taken with the requisite "transparency" and "due process." See, e.g., S. Rep. 96-249, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 41 (1979).

[1] The letter was made part of the Subcommittee's Hearing (at page 37) on "Possible Amendments to the '1916 Antidumping Act'" held on March 11, 1980, the printed version of which is undoubtedly available to you.

[2] It is also of interest that at the 1980 Hearings, a memorandum was submitted by three experienced trade lawyers, including Gary N. Horlick, now the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Import Administration at the Commerce Department, and, thus, the official now most directly responsible for the administration of the antidumping laws and representing the United States at the GATT with respect to such matters. It concluded that it "seems incontrovertible" that no admendments to the Antidumping Act of 1916 similar to those in S. 2167 would "in any way be circumscribed by the trade agreement obligations of the United States." Hearings, supra, at 23.

The mere enactment of a law creating (or amending) a possible private damage remedy is surely not a "specific action against dumping of exports" within the meaning of Article 16 of the Code. Thus, the passage of a bill such as S. 2167 is not covered by this provision. And the implementation of a measure such as would be authorized by S. 2167 should also not be seen as a "specific action against the dumping of exports"; it is only the invocation of a traditional legal remedy by one "person" for economic harm knowingly done by another. As already noted, the addressees of the cited provision—as all other provisions in the GATT—are governments and not private parties.

3. Damages are not "duties."

The Administration has reiterated suggestions that the GATT and Code permit the imposition of antidumping duties only after governmental findings of dumping margins and material injury to a domestic industry caused thereby.[3] These observations are accurate—but beside the point. The compensation to be collected by a damaged domestic producer from a foreign seller (or its U.S. importer) under the proposed statute would not involve the imposition of an "antidumping duty" as that term has been historically understood or is commonly used today. The term has a precise meaning. It means a certain type of customs duty collected on the importation of merchandise from its importer and then deposited in a government treasury. It does not include the type of damages collectible by private parties that S. 2167 would authorize.

In that connection, I might add that it is undeniable that S. 2167 or a similar law may constitute an additional "non-tariff barrier" (NTB) to imports. And it is also true that it was one of the aims of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN) out of which the current antidumping Code emerged, to reduce NTB's. But many existing or imaginable NTB's were unaffected by what occurred in the MTN, including most notably the rules concerning "safeguards" (in our parlance "escape clause" actions). The subject of private remedies to counter "unfair trade practices" was simply not discussed and no agreement concerning their use was even tabled for consideration.

4. The 1916 Act is "grandfathered" under the Protocol.

Even if the 1916 Act were in some way inconsistent with the GATT and Code, these international agreements apply only to the extent they are not "inconsistent with existing legislation" under the Protocol of Provisional Application by which the United States adhered to the General Agreement. The 1916 Act antedates both the GATT and Code by many years. The amendments now proposed—particularly to the extent they eliminate the risks of treble damages or criminal penalties—cannot be regarded as new law not embraced by the Protocol. They are a continuation of that statute.

In the Trade Act of 1974 Congress extended the countervailing duty law to products not otherwise subject to ordinary customs duties. In that context, Congress felt that the GATT obligated the United States to apply an "injury test" to such imports before applying CVD's. The Protocol did not shield that new, substantive—and more onerous—obligation on foreign exporters. See S. Rep. 93-1298, 93d Cong. 2d Sess. 185 (1974); S. Rep. 96-249, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 39 (1979). However, that is not an apt analogy to the present situation. While the amendments proposed in S. 2167 are intended to revive what is universally regarded as a "dead letter" of our law through certain procedural (e.g., allowing use of administrative determinations as prima facie evidence in court proceedings), the substantive aspects of the law should be less onerous to companies in the countries that are our trading partners. Such a relaxation of existing law (from the foreigners' vantage point) should, therefore, still be shielded from claims of GATT inconsistency by the Protocol.

I hope that the foregoing is useful. At the same time, permit me both to thank you for this additional opportunity to present my views and to express my satisfaction that your amended bill has taken account of many of the points I made when I testified on May 24. To that I might just add for your information that a new complaint under the existing 1916 Act has recently been filed in the U.S., District Court in Denver by CF&I Steel Corp. of Pueblo, claiming Mitsui & Co. sold a variety of imported steel products in violation of the Act. CF&I Steel Corp. v. Mitsui & Co. (USA), Inc., Civ. Action No. 82-Z-1269 (D. Col. 1982). However, expeditious action seems unlikely. See, for example, the ongoing case of Outboard Marine Corp. v. Pezetel, in which the most recent opinion of the District Court permitting the plaintiff to amend its complaint was recently published. 3 ITRD 1917 (D. Del. 1982). The case was also initially brought, inter alia, under the 1916 Act but is now being prosecuted solely as a straight antitrust suit claiming predatory pricing. The original complaint was filed in February 1977; the recent amendment was allowed more than five years later, still well before trial and before the defendants have been permitted even to initiate discovery on their antitrust counterclaims. I think the case illustrates why I do not think your bill, although a useful addition to our trade laws, will provide the speedy action your statements at the hearing in May indicated you were seeking.

Sincerely,

PETER D. EHRENHAFT.

Re Amendments to the Antidumping Act of 1916.

Hon. ABRAHAM A. RIBICOFF,
Chairman, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Finance, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I appreciated the opportunity to appear before your Subcommittee on March 11 and share with you and your colleagues some of the impressions gained from my experience in the administration of the Antidumping Act of 1921 while serving as the Deputy Assistant Secretary and Special Counsel for Tariff Affairs at the Treasury through the end of 1979. One issue that was raised at the hearing, however, that I did not have time to address concerned your question about the compatibility of a statute authorizing a private cause of action to recover damages caused by dumping with the newly negotiated Code on Antidumping Measures to which the United States has now adhered. It is a very good question. I cannot provide you with a legal opinion as a reply. But I can indicate my views, based on more than 22 years of study and experience with antidumping laws and my particular recent responsibility both in connection with the negotiation of the Antidumping Code in the MTN and leading the U.S. delegation to the 1977 through 1979 meetings of the GATT Antidumping Committee.

In my judgment, a statute, permitting the recovery of compensatory—particularly "single," as opposed to "treble"—damages for injury caused by tortious business behavior could not be regarded as a breach of the Antidumping Code.

First, the Antidumping Code is an agreement on the "Implementation of Article VI of the GATT." Article VI of the GATT does not prescribe the only method for dealing with the problem of dumping. Section 1 defines the concept of dumping—injurious price discrimination between national markets—and Section 2 states that:

"In order to offset or prevent dumping a contracting party may levy an antidumping duty not greater in amount than the margin of dumping. . . ."

The GATT, itself, thus does not suggest, much less state expressly, that antidumping duties are the exclusive method by which the problem of dumping may be addressed. It simply indicates that if the problem is attacked through the imposition of an "antidumping duty," that duty may not exceed the margin of dumping.

Second, the Code, itself, is concerned only with the implementation of the cited Article of the GATT. That is clear from Article I of the Code, taken almost verbatim from the 1967 Code. The Code speaks about the "imposition of an antidumping duty . . . to be taken only under the circumstances provided for . . . and pursuant to . . . this Code." Thus, the Code also does not affect other actions that are not in the nature of "duties," that may affect goods that are "dumped."

Third, both when the 1967 Code was negotiated and throughout the MTN, our trading partners (not to speak of the U.S. negotiators) knew about the existence of the U.S. 1916 Antidumping Act providing criminal penalties and treble damages for acts that are comparable to those at which antidumping "duties" are aimed. Nevertheless, as far as I know, no claim was ever made by any foreign government or any U.S. agency that the existing 1916 law contravenes the Code. It may be argued that the existing law, with its requirement for "intentional injury" defines offensive behavior different in kind from that addressed by the GATT or the Code. However, that argument supports the view that the Code does not exhaust all possible remedies that a government may adopt to combat or remedy practices analogous to the "strict liability" dumping defined by the Code (i.e., "dumping" without any "intent to injure" element).

A statute that provides compensatory damages recoverable through a private action in a court of law for market behavior that has unjustifiably caused injury should not be read to be—and, in my view, is not—inconsistent with the Code. It supplements the Code-envisaged remedy. Even retention of treble damages and criminal penalties for intentional injurious behavior should not be regarded as Code inconsistent. However, as a number of witnesses at the hearing indicated, the existing antitrust laws would seem adequate to cope with intentionally harmful pricing and no further civil remedy is needed to deal with it.

A slightly more troublesome issue was raised by some witnesses concerning the possible incompatibility of a statute permitting a cause of action affecting only imported goods with the "national treatment" provisions of Article III of the GATT. However, we presently have domestic laws—primarily the Robinson-Patman Act—that contemplate remedies against sellers who discriminate between markets to the detriment of the seller's competitors. (Representatives of the American Importers Association discussed at the hearing the wholly separate—and admittedly inapplicable—remedy of the Robinson-Patman Act available to competitors of a favored customer.) The creation of a remedy addressed to imported goods causing injury to competition at the seller's level should not breach Article III to the extent that it parallels comparable domestic law. Mere extension of the Robinson-Patman Act to international trade would be one way to achieve that result. But it may not be the best method, in part because it may be desirable for some of the reasons indicated in my oral testimony to vest trial jurisdiction over the international remedy in the Customs Court that will otherwise be interpreting the language of the antidumping laws.

In any event, before any action is taken to create a new cause of action, I would urge the Subcommittee to commission some further, serious factual studies of the existence of "dumping" as a real phenomenon in U.S. trade and the extent to which our existing laws have affected both trade in particular and the economy of the Nation in general. I believe such a study would support my impression that a private remedy of the type being proposed might make good sense for many of the smaller cases that make up the bulk of the work of the "Administering Authority," while the law is not well suited to cope realistically with the big cases. For those problems—steel, textiles, automobiles—alternative, more macro-economic responses are required outside either the private suits contemplated by the bill you are considering or the procedures now authorized by the Trade Agreements Act.

Respectfully submitted,

PETER D. EHRENHAFT.

INTERNATIONAL ANTIDUMPING AGREEMENTS

One final question must be addressed. Would amending the 1916 Antidumping Act as proposed herein violate any of the international obligations of the United States assumed as a signatory to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)[198] or the International Antidumping Code of 1979[199] formulated during the Tokyo Round of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations?[200]

Article VI of the GATT and the International Antidumping Code of 1979 do not by their own terms prohibit national legislation, such as the 1916 Antidumping Act, from providing remedial relief against dumping.[201] When the GATT and the antidumping code were negotiated, one may rightfully argue that the United States' trading partners knew of the existence of U.S. legislation that provided for judicial remedial relief in the form of treble damages upon a finding of international price discrimination. Nevertheless, no claim was or has ever been made that any of the provisions of the 1916 Antidumping Act contravened either the GATT or the antidumping code.[202] Even assuming arguendo that remedial relief statutes such as the 1916 Act would be inconsistent with article VI of the GATT, the United States is not necessarily bound by that article due to a provision exempting countries with conflicting preexisting legislation from compliance.[203]

The International Antidumping Code of 1979 sought to establish uniformity among signatories in implementing the GATT antidumping provisions.[204] The Code is thus merely an agreement among signatories for the implementation of article VI of the GATT. Neither the GATT nor the Code mandates or even suggests that imposition of dumping duties is the exclusive form of relief sanctioned against dumping.[205] Section 2 of article VI of the GATT merely provides that if a signatory wishes to attack an antidumping practice by levying an antidumping duty then the duty cannot exceed the margin of dumping.[206] Finally, since the amended 1916 Act would provide relief when there is injury to an industry as defined in the Antidumping Act of 1921, as amended, and the 1921 Act was amended to conform to the 1979 Code,[207] the terms of the amended 1916 Act would comply with the implementing Code.

One other argument which may be raised is the notion that amendments to the 1916 Act may contravene the "national treatment" article of the GATT.[208] Article III provides that "[t]he products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded to like products of national origin . . ." Neither the 1916 Antidumping Act nor the amendments proposed herein favor domestically produced articles over imported articles, since the former are subject to a comparable price discrimination law, the Robinson-Patman Act.[209] In conclusion, neither the 1916 Antidumping Act nor the amendments proposed here are contrary to the obligations undertaken by the United States as a signatory to the GATT.

CONCLUSION

The 1916 Antidumping Act has not proved to be an effective means of redress for private parties injured by the pricing practices of U.S. importers or foreign manufacturers. Because the Antidumping Act of 1921 provides only prospective relief after a complex administrative determination, the ability of a U.S. industry to obtain treble damages for harm actually inflicted by dumping practices would further the policy of prohibiting international price discrimination much in the same manner as the ability of antitrust plaintiffs to obtain treble damages furthers the policies underlying the Sherman Act. The question that ultimately must be addressed is whether Congress is sufficiently committed to the policy of preventing harm to U.S. industries from the deleterious pricing practices of foreign manufacturers that it will coordinate the antidumping legislation to best achieve its underlying policies.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Senator SPECTER's legislation, amending the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 12), provides American industries injured by unfair foreign competition with an avenue of redress through the Federal courts. I was an original cosponsor of this measure when it was first introduced in the 97th Congress, and I was pleased to be an original cosponsor of S. 418, as this measure was designated in the 98th Congress.

[200] In the sixty-six years since the passage of the 1916 Antidumping Act, dumping has often been the subject of international discussion. As early as 1927, the World Economic Conference in Geneva passed a resolution recognizing the harmful influence dumping may have on a domestic economy. See Marks, supra note 19, at 586. By the 1930s, at least twenty-five countries had adopted some kind of antidumping law. Id. In 1947, GATT was adopted; GATT condemns dumping if it causes or threatens material injury to an established industry in the territory of a contracting party or materially retards the establishment of a domestic industry. GATT, supra note 198, art. VI, para. 1. During the Kennedy Round of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, GATT members adopted a Dumping Code designed to encourage uniform dumping laws. Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, done June 30, 1967, 19 U.S.T. 4348, T.I.A.S. No. 6431. The 1967 Code provided guidance in the interpretation of the concepts of "causation," "injury," and "industry." See Technical Analysis, supra note 12, at 1411-14. The U.S. Congress specifically declined to implement the 1967 Code because of constitutional questions and the reluctance to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921. See id. at 1414-15. Pursuant to the Tokyo Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations, the International Dumping Code of 1979, supra note 199, was adopted. In order to harmonize the world antidumping laws, the Code provides uniform definitions of "industry," "injury," and "causation," id. arts. 4, 3 reprinted in MTA at 314-16, as well as procedural changes to make the resolution of dumping disputes more equitable. See Technical Analysis, supra note 12, at 1416-19. The Trade Agreements Act of 1979, supra note 12, repealed the Antidumping Act, 1921, and replaced it with provisions designed to be consistent with the International Antidumping Code of 1979. See note 12 supra. While the expressed intention of Congress was to enact legislation consistent with obligations contained in the Code, this intention was qualified by the language: "as the United States understands those obligations." S. Rep. No. 249, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 15-16, 36 (1979). Congress' legislative response to the 1968 and 1979 Codes demonstrates that although Congress is aware of its international obligations, it does not view its own power as necessarily limited by those agreements.

The purpose of this bill is to provide an effective remedy when an American industry is injured by goods dumped into our market or subsidized by foreign interests. This measure is of particular importance to America's steel industry. While the administration has managed to obtain commitments from several important steel-exporting countries which will limit their share of the American market, we cannot be certain that the administration's program will answer the challenge to the steel industry posed by other unfair foreign competition. Senator SPECTER's bill will complement existing trade laws and assure that industries such as steel will be able to respond appropriately if foreign producers continue to flood the American market with products priced below market rates.

I commend Senator SPECTER for his commitment in bringing this matter before the Senate once again, and I am pleased to appear as an original cosponsor of this bill.

S. 239. A bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL LAWS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today three bills that passed the Senate during the last Congress by significant margins. They deal with vital issues relating to the administration of the criminal laws in this country: Federal habeas corpus review of State criminal convictions; use of the exclusionary rule in Federal criminal trials; and establishment of constitutional procedures for imposition of the death penalty for certain Federal offenses. Unfortunately, in the last Congress, the House took no action on these bills, despite the substantial support for them demonstrated in the votes by which the Senate passed all three measures.

HABEAS CORPUS REFORM

Mr. President, Congress must act, without further unnecessary delay, to reform Federal habeas corpus and collateral attack procedures. This will minimize Federal judicial interference with State criminal convictions, promote finality of such convictions, and deal with common abuses typical of habeas prisoner petitions. The Judiciary Committee reported such a bill in the first session of the last Congress (S. 1763; S. Rept. No. 98-226). The Senate passed the bill on February 6, 1984, by an overwhelming vote of 67 to 9. The measure I am introducing now is identical to S. 1763 as passed by the Senate last Congress.

This bill proposes amendments to various sections of chapter 153 of title 28 of the United States Code, and a related rule of appellate procedure. Its objectives are to establish a more appropriate scope and function for Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners, accord more appropriate weight to State interests in finality and orderly procedures in criminal adjudication, improve the efficiency of habeas corpus litigation and appellate review of such litigation, and effect certain corresponding improvements in the operation of collateral remedies for Federal prisoners. The proposed amendments would change the operation of Federal collateral remedies in several respects.

First, the proposed amendments would preclude granting relief with respect to matters that have been fully and fairly adjudicated in State proceedings. This important change would enhance the finality of State criminal adjudications and avoid duplicative litigation of claims that have already been adequately considered and decided.

Second, the proposed amendments would generally bar cognition of claims that have not been properly raised in State proceedings, provided the State has afforded the petitioner an opportunity consistent with the requirements of Federal law to raise his claims in the State proceedings.

Third, the proposed amendments would establish a 1-year limitation period for the filing of habeas corpus petitions by State prisoners, which would generally run from the time of exhaustion of State remedies. This limitation period would bar petitions in cases in which the passage of time has made reliable adjudication of the petitioner's claims or retrial of the petitioner difficult or impossible. The limitation period would also advance the policies supporting finality and repose in criminal adjudication.

Fourth, the proposed amendments would clearly state that a Federal habeas court can deny a petition on the merits without requiring prior exhaustion of State remedies, thereby avoiding the waste of judicial resources that results when a person presenting a frivolous petition is sent back to the State courts to exhaust State remedies.

Fifth, the proposed amendments would vest in the judges of the courts of appeals exclusive authority to issue certificates of probable cause for appeal in habeas corpus proceedings. This would entrust the decision concerning the propriety of an appeal to the judges who are in the best position to determine if there is a realistic likelihood of reversal. It would also avoid duplicative consideration of the suitability of a case for appeal, first by a district judge, and then by a circuit judge.

Sixth, the proposed amendments would make similar changes in the law governing applications for collateral relief by Federal prisoners pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 2255 in the areas of appeal, procedural default, and time limitation.

Mr. President, each of these proposals is discussed in more detail in the committee report on S. 1763. I urge my colleagues to study this important bill and help us obtain early action this Congress.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE

Mr. President, the second bill I am reintroducing today would modify the exclusionary rule as presently applied in Federal cases. It also was acted on by the Judiciary Committee last Congress (S. 1764; S. Rept. No. 98-350), and passed the Senate by a significant margin: a vote of 63 to 24.

This measure is important, but relatively simple. It would change the current case law with respect to admission of illegally seized evidence in a criminal trial to permit such use if the evidence is obtained, with or without a warrant, by a law enforcement officer acting with a reasonable, good faith belief that his conduct conforms with the fourth amendemnt. This world, in essence, codify the 1984 Supreme Court decision in United States versus Leon with respect to searches pursuant to a warrant, and extend the application of the Leon rationale to warrantless searches.

In essence, the Supreme Court has approached the extension of the rule through a cost-benefit analysis, under which it has refused to suppress illegally seized evidence where the impact of excluding the evidence outweighs the theoretical deterrent effect on police conduct. The latest decisions—United States versus Leon and Massachusetts versus Sheppard—held that illegally seized evidence should not be suppressed in the prosecution's case-in-chief when the officer conducting the search acted in objective, reasonable reliance on a warrant issued by a detached and neutral magistrate although the warrant subsequently was determined to be invalid. In my judgment, a similar result should occur with respect to objectively reasonable searches without a warrant. As noted in the Judiciary Committee report from the last Congress (S. Rept. No. 98-350 at 8):

> Any fair analysis reveals that the costs of the exclusionary rule far outweigh its presumed benefits when applied to reasonable good faith police conduct that may, in retrospect, be deemed by the courts to be illegal.

I wish to reiterate my view that this is a modest effort to make the application of the exclusionary rule consistent with the modern rationale enunciated by the Supreme Court as the basis for the rule—the deterrence of unlawful police conduct. My personal preference would be to abolish the exclusionary rule altogether and substitute effective, alternative civil remedies to deter unlawful police conduct. However, the approach of the bill may be more politically feasible and would ameliorate the harsh, illogical operation of the present exclusionary rule to some extent.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The third bill I am introducing today is also long overdue for enactment. It provides a constitutional procedure for imposition of the death penalty for certain Federal crimes; treason, espionage, crimes involving the death of a person, and an attempt to assassinate the President of the United States.

Mr. President, this procedure is designed to meet the constitutional defects found to exist in then existing capital punishment procedures by the Supreme Court in Furman versus Georgia in 1972, and subsequent decisions. These defects centered around the unfettered discretion residing in the jury to impose the death penalty without meaningful statutory guidance.

The procedure provided in this bill would involve a two-stage trial to determine when the death penalty should be imposed. During the first stage, the jury or judge would consider only the issue of guilt and only evidence related to that issue would be admissible. Upon a finding of guilty of one of the specified capital offenses, if the Government has filed a pretrial notice of intent to seek the death penalty, specifying the aggravating factors to be proved, the second stage of the trial would be entered. At that point, the jury would determine, pursuant to criteria set forth in the bill, whether or not the death penalty should be imposed.

The criteria, in essence, consist of statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances for the jury or judge to use as guidance in the decisionmaking process. The bill also contains a provision setting forth certain factors—such as race or national origin of the defendant—that should not play a part in determining an appropriate sentence. Once a sentence of death is imposed, the bill would provide for an expedited appeal.

Mr. President, this legislation has had a long history. It has been thoroughly debated and passed the Senate by a vote of 63 to 32 last year. I urge my colleagues to obtain the committee report on S. 1765 in the 98th Congress (S. Rept. No. 98-251) to become familiar with the issues involved and the details of the bill. It should have been enacted years ago.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I have presented a bare outline of three important issues that will be considered by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary during this first session of the 99th Congress. These issues merit the attention of each Senator. I hope this will be the Congress to finally make these improvements in our Federal criminal justice system.

I ask unanimous consent that the bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 237

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Exclusionary Rule Limitation Act of 1985."

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

§ 3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule

"Except as specifically provided by statute, evidence which is obtained as a result of a search or seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a proceeding in a court of the United States if the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. A showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a reasonable good faith belief, unless the warrant was obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation.".

(b) The table of sections of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following item:

"3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule.".

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1985."

SEC. 2. Section 2244 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(d) When a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court fails to raise a claim in State proceedings at the time or in the manner required by State rules or procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in an application for a writ of habeas corpus unless actual prejudice resulted to the applicant from the alleged denial of the Federal right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly or to have it heard in State proceedings was the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(2) the Federal right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"(e) A one-year period of limitation shall apply to an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which State remedies are exhausted;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to filing an application created by State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, where the applicant was prevented from filing by such State action;

"(3) the time at which the Federal right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence.".

SEC. 3. Section 2253 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2253. Appeal

"In a habeas corpus proceeding or a proceeding under section 2255 of this title before a circuit or district judge, the final order shall be subject to review, on appeal, by the court of appeals for the circuit where the proceeding is had.

"There shall be no right of appeal from such an order in a proceeding to test the validity of a warrant to remove, to another district or place for commitment or trial, a person charged with a criminal offense against the United States, or to test the validity of his detention pending removal proceedings.

"An appeal may not be taken to the court of appeals from the final order in a habeas corpus proceeding where the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, or from the final order in a proceeding under section 2255 of this title, unless a circuit justice or judge issues a certificate of probable cause.".

SEC. 4. Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 22 is amended to read as follows:

"RULE 22.

"HABEAS CORPUS AND § 2255 PROCEEDINGS

"(a) Application for an Original Writ of Habeas Corpus. An application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be made to the appropriate district court. If application is made to a circuit judge, the application will ordinarily be transferred to the appropriate district court. If an application is made to or transferred to the district court and denied, renewal of the application before a circuit judge is not favored; the proper remedy is by appeal to the court of appeals from the order of the district court denying the writ.

"(b) Necessity of Certificate of Probable Cause for Appeal. In a habeas corpus proceeding in which the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, and in a motion proceeding pursuant to section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, an appeal by the applicant or movant may not proceed unless a circuit judge issues a certificate of probable cause. If a request for a certificate of probable cause is addressed to the court of appeals, it shall be deemed addressed to the judges thereof and shall be considered by a circuit judge or judges as the court deems appropriate. If no express request for a certificate is filed, the notice of appeal shall be deemed to constitute a request addressed to the judges of the court of appeals. If an appeal is taken by a State or the government or its representative, a certificate of probable cause is not required.".

SEC. 5. Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by redesignating subsections "(c)" and "(f)" as subsections "(f)" and "(g)", respectively, and is further amended—

(a) by amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted unless it appears that the applicant has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State, or that there is either an absence of available State corrective process or the existence of circumstances rendering such process ineffective to protect the rights of the applicant. An application may be denied on the merit notwithstanding the failure of the applicant to exhaust the remedies available in the courts of the States.";

(b) by redesignating subsection "(d)" as subsection "(e)", and amending it to read as follows:

"(e) In a proceeding instituted by an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, a full and fair determination of a factual issue made in the case by a State court shall be presumed to be correct. The applicant shall have the burden of rebutting this presumption by clear and convincing evidence."; and

(c) by adding a new subsection (d) reading as follows:

"(d) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim that has been fully and fairly adjudicated in State proceedings.".

SEC. 6. Section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by deleting the second paragraph and the penultimate paragraph thereof, and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"When a person fails to raise a claim at the time or in the manner required by Federal rules of procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in a motion under this section unless actual prejudice resulted to the movant from the alleged denial of the right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly, or to have it heard, was the result of governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(2) the right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"A two-year period of limitation shall apply to a motion under this section. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which the judgment of conviction becomes final;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to making a motion created by governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, where the movant was prevented from making a motion by such governmental action;

"(3) the time at which the right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence.".

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title 18 of the United States Code is amended—

(a) by adding the following new chapter after chapter 227:

"CHAPTER 228—DEATH SENTENCE

"Sec.

"3591. Sentence of death.
"3592. Factors to be considered in determining whether a death is justified.
"3593. Special hearing to determine whether a sentence of death is justified.
"3594. Imposition of a sentence of death.

"§ 3691. Sentence of death

"A defendant who has been found guilty of—

"(a) an offense described in section 794 or section 2381 of this title;

"(1) intentionally killed the victim;

"(2) intentionally inflicted serious bodily injury that resulted in the death of the victim; or

"(3) intentionally participated in an act that he knew, or reasonably should have known, would create a grave risk of death to a person, other than one of the participants in the offense, and the victim died as a direct result of the the act; shall be sentenced to death if, after consideration of the factors set forth in section 3592 in the course of a hearing held pursuant to section 3593, it is determined that imposition of a sentence of death is justified.

"§ 3592. Factors to be considered in determining whether a sentence of death is justified

"(a) MITIGATING FACTORS.—In determining whether a sentence of death is justified for any offense, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following mitigating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(1) the defendant was less than eighteen years of age at the time of the offense;

"(2) the defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired, although the impairment was not such as to constitute a defense to prosecution;

"(3) the defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as would constitute a defense to prosecution; and

"(4) the defendant was an accomplice whose participation in the offense was relatively minor.

The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, may consider whether any other mitigating factor exists.

"(b) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR ESPIONAGE AND TREASON.—In determining whether a sentence of death is justified for an offense described in section 3591(a), the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following aggravating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(1) the defendant has previously been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which either a sentence of life imprisonment or death was authorized by statute;

"(2) in the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of substantial danger to the national security; and

"(3) in the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person.

The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, may consider whether any other aggravating factor exists.

"(c) AGGRAVATING FACTORS FOR HOMICIDE AND FOR ATTEMPTED MURDER OF THE PRESIDENT.—In determining whether a sentence of death is justified for an offense described in section 3591 (b) or (c), the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider each of the following aggravating factors and determine which, if any, exist:

"(1) the death, or injury resulting in death, occurred during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission of, an offense under section 751 (prisoners in custody of institution of officer), section 794 (gathering or delivering defense information to aid foreign government), section 844(d) (transportation of explosives in interstate commerce for certain purposes), section 844(f) (destruction of Government property in interstate commerce by explosives), section 1118 (prisoners serving life term), section 1201 (kidnaping), or section 2381 (treason) of this title, or section 902 (i) or (n) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1472 (i) or (n)) (aircraft piracy);

"(2) the defendant has previously been convicted of another Federal or State offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or a sentence of death was authorized by statute;

"(3) the defendant has previously been convicted of two or more Federal or State offenses, punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury or death upon another person;

"(4) the defendant, in the commission of the offense, knowingly created a grave risk of death to one or more persons in addition to the victim of the offense;

"(5) the defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner;

"(6) the defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value;

"(7) the defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in the expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value;

"(8) the defendant committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation to cause the death of a person or commit an act of terrorism; or

"(9) the defendant committed the offense against—

"(A) the President of the United States, the President-elect, the Vice President, the Vice-President-elect, the Vice-President-designate, or, if there is no Vice President, the officer next in order of succession to the office of the President of the United States, or any person who is acting as President under the Constitution and laws of the United States;

"(B) a chief of state, head of government, or the political equivalent, of a foreign nation;

"(C) a foreign official listed in section 1116(b)(3)(A) of this title, if he is in the United States on official business; or

"(D) a Federal public servant who is a judge, a law enforcement officer, or an employee of a United States penal or correctional institution—

"(i) while he is engaged in the performance of his official duties;

"(ii) because of the performance of his official duties; or

"(iii) because of his status as a public servant.

For purposes of this subparagraph, a 'law enforcement officer' is a public servant authorized by law or by a Government agency or Congress to conduct or engage in the prevention, investigation, or prosecution of an offense.

The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, may consider whether any other aggravating factor exists.

"§ 3593. Special hearing to determine whether a sentence of death is justified

"(a) NOTICE BY THE GOVERNMENT.—If, in a case involving an offense described in section 3591, the attorney for the government believes that the circumstances of the offense are such that a sentence of death is justified under this chapter, he shall, a reasonable time before the trial, or before acceptance by the court of a plea of guilty, or at such time thereafter as the court may permit upon a showing of good cause, sign and file with the court, and serve on the defendant, a notice—

"(1) stating that the government believes that the circumstances of the offense are such that, if the defendant is convicted, a sentence of death is justified under this chapter; and

"(2) setting forth the aggravating factor or factors that the government, if the defendant is convicted, proposes to prove as justifying a sentence of death.

The court may permit the attorney for the government to amend the notice upon a showing of good cause.

"(b) HEARING BEFORE A COURT OF LAW.—If the attorney for the government has filed a notice as required under subsection (a) and the defendant is found guilty of an offense described in section 3591, the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered, or another judge if that judge is unavailable, shall conduct a separate sentencing hearing to determine the punishment to be imposed. Prior to such a hearing, no presentence report shall be prepared by the United States Probation Service, notwithstanding the provisions of Rule 32(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The hearing shall be conducted—

"(1) before the jury that determined the defendant's guilt;

"(2) before a jury impaneled for the purpose of the hearing if—

"(A) the defendant was convicted upon a plea of guilty;

"(B) the defendant was convicted after a trial before the court sitting without a jury;

"(C) the jury that determined the defendant's guilt was discharged for good cause; or

"(D) after initial imposition of a sentence under this section, reconsideration of the sentence under this section is necessary; or

"(3) before the court alone, upon the motion of the defendant and with the approval of the attorney for the government.

A jury impaneled pursuant to paragraph (2) shall consist of twelve members, unless, at any time before the conclusion of the hearing, the parties stipulate, with the approval of the court, that it shall consist of a lesser number.

"(c) PROOF OF MITIGATING AND AGGRAVATING FACTORS.—At the hearing, information may be presented as to any matter relevant to the sentence, including any mitigating or aggravating factor permitted or required to be considered under section 3592. Information presented may include the trial transcript and exhibits if the hearing is held before a jury or judge not present during the trial. Any other information relevant to a mitigating or aggravating factor may be presented by either the attorney for the government or the de fendant, regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials, except that information may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of creating unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, or misleading the jury. The attorney for the government and the defendant shall be permitted to rebut any information received at the hearing, and shall be given fair opportunity to present argument as to the adequacy of the information to establish the existence of any aggravating or mitigating factor, and as to the appropriateness in the case of imposing a sentence of death. The attorney for the government shall open the argument. The defendant shall be permitted to reply. The attorney for the government shall then be permitted to reply in rebuttal. The burden of establishing the existence of any aggravating factor is on the government, and is not satisfied unless the existence of such a factor is established beyond a reasonable doubt. The burden of establishing the existence of any mitigating factor is on the defendant, and is not satisfied unless the existence of such a factor is established by a preponderance of the information.

"(d) RETURN OF SPECIAL FINDINGS.—The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider all the information received during the hearing. It shall return a special finding as to each mitigating and aggravating factor, concerning which information is presented at the hearing, required to be considered under section 3592. The jury must find the existence of a mitigating or aggravating factor by a unanimous vote, although it is unnecessary that there be a unanimous vote on any specific mitigating or aggravating factor if a majority of the jury finds the existence of such a specific factor.

"(e) RETURN OF A FINDING CONCERNING A SENTENCE OF DEATH.—If, in the case of—

"(1) an offense described in section 3591(a), an aggravating factor required to be considered under section 3592(b) is found to exist; or the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall then consider whether all the aggravating factors found to exist sufficiently outweigh all the mitigating factors found to exist to justify a sentence of death, or, in the absence of a mitigating factor, whether the aggravating factors alone are sufficient to justify a sentence of death. Based upon this consideration, the jury by unanimous vote, or if there is no jury, the court, shall return a finding as to whether a sentence of death is justified.

"(2) an offense described in section 3591 (b) or (c), an aggravating factor required to be considered under section 3592(c) is found to exist;

"(f) SPECIAL PRECAUTION TO ASSURE AGAINST DISCRIMINATION.—In a hearing held before a jury, the court, prior to the return of a finding under subsection (c), shall instruct the jury that, in considering whether a sentence of death is justified, it shall not consider the race, color, national origin, creed, or sex of the defendant. The jury, upon return of a finding under subsection (e), shall also return to the court a certificate, signed by each juror, that consideration of the race, color, national origin, creed, or sex of the defendant was not involved in reaching the juror's individual decision.

"§ 3594. Imposition of a sentence of death

"Upon a finding under section 3593(c) that a sentence of death is justified, the court shall sentence the defendant to death. Upon a finding under section 3593(c) that a sentence of death is not justified, or under section 3593(d) that no aggravating factor required to be found exists, the court shall impose any sentence other than death that is authorized by law. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the offense is life imprisonment, the court may impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole.

"§ 3595. Review of a sentence of death

"(a) APPEAL.—In a case in which a sentence of death is imposed, the sentence shall be subject to review by the court of appeals upon appeal by the defendant. Notice of appeal must be filed within the time specified for the filing of a notice of appeal. An appeal under this section may be consolidated with an appeal of the judgement of conviction and shall have priority over all other cases.

"(b) REVIEW.—The court of appeals shall review the entire record in the case, including—

"(1) the evidence submitted during the trial;

"(2) the information submitted during the sentence hearing;

"(3) the procedures employed in the sentencing hearing; and

"(4) the special findings returned under section 3593(d).

"(c) DECISION AND DISPOSITION.—

"(1) If the court of appeals determines that—

"(A) the sentence of death was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor; and

"(B) the information supports the special finding of the existence of an aggravating factor required to be considered under section 3592;

it shall affirm the sentence.

"(2) In any other court of appeals shall remand the case for reconsideration under section 3593.

"(3) The court of appeals shall state in writing the reasons for its disposition of an appeal of a sentence of death under this section.

"§ 3596. Implementation of a sentence of death

"A person who has been sentenced to death pursuant to the provisions of this chapter shall be committed to the custody of the Attorney General until exhaustion of the procedures for appeal of the judgment of conviction and for review of the sentence. When the sentence is to be implemented, the Attorney General shall release the person sentenced to death to the custody of a United States marshal, who shall supervise implementation of the sentence in the manner prescribed by the law of the State in which the sentence is imposed. If the law of such State does not provide for implementation of a sentence of death, the court shall designate another State, the law of which does so provide, and the sentence shall be implemented in the latter State in the manner prescribed by such law. A sentence of death shall not be carried out upon a woman while she is pregnant.

"§ 3597. Use of State facilities

"A United States marshal charged with supervising the implementation of a sentence of death may use appropriate State or local facilities for the purpose, may use the services of an appropriate State or local official or of a person such an official employs for the purpose, and shall pay the costs thereof in an amount approved by the Attorney General.";

CONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURES FOR THE IMPOSITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, Mr. THURMOND, in strong support of this bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death for certain Federal offenses.

Not since the Supreme Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), striking down Federal and State death penalty statutes that allowed for unguided discretion by the trier of fact to determine whether or not the death penalty should be imposed, have American citizens had the protection that capital punishment can provide. The bill provides for the return of that protection by incorporating constitutionally acceptable procedures that guard against the unfettered discretion condemned in Furman.

Following the 1976 rulings by the Supreme Court in a group of landmark death penalty cases (Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976); Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976); Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976); and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976)), the bill provides for a bifurcated trial. That is, first the trier of fact would determine guilt or innocence. Then, after the defendant is convicted of an offense for which the penalty of death is authorized, the court would hold a separate hearing to determine whether or not the death penalty should be imposed. At that hearing, which would normally be before the same jury that conducted the trial, or before the judge if both parties agree, both sides would have an opportunity to present all relevant information. That procedure would require the factfinder to determine the existence of statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances as a basis for proceeding to the ultimate determination of the penalty to be imposed.

Putting the death penalty back into the Federal criminal justice system is a step that, in my view, is long overdue. For far too long, the pendulum of justice has swung in the wrong direction, and too much attention has been paid to the rights of convicted criminals. The excess of attention that has been given to the rights of criminals has been produced by sacrificing the greater right of society to live free from the fear of violent harm and the rights of the victims against whom convicted criminals have committed their heinous crimes.

Governments, particularly governments of law and not of men, have no higher duty than to protect the governed from harm. The Founding Fathers themselves recognized that principle and gave it the primacy it deserves by setting forth in the preamble to our Constitution the mandate to "establish Justice" and to "provide for the common defense." The death penalty implements the principle not only by providing a deterrent to individuals, but also by providing a social and general deterrence to crime by showing the seriousness with which the society views extreme cases of unlawful conduct. As a result, the population as a whole is made aware of the horror of the most serious crimes, and the n embers of society acquire the desire to avoid such criminal behavior.

Capital punishment also has an incapacitating effect. The death penalty prevents continued commission of truly serious crimes by incorrigibly antisocial criminals who would otherwise remain potentially dangerous to society for the rest of their natural lives. Mere imprisonment only offers those individuals the possibility of escape or, in some cases, release on parole. Life imprisonment without parole only increases the dangers to guards and other prisoners who come into contact with the most dangerous offenders.

Finally, capital punishment serves the legitimate function of retribution. It allows society to extract legitimate retribution from people whose behavior so transcends the bounds of acceptable conduct that they take the lives of their fellow citizens. Additionally it allows society to express its outrage and sense of revulsion toward those who undermine the foundations of our society through contravention of its law. Not only must innocent life be protected by any society, but that society must be willing to impose its severest penalty upon those who take the lives of others.

Claims from some quarters that support for abolishment of the death penalty is growing are just not true. In fact, support for capital punishment is widespread. The American Bar Association/University of Chicago poll found that over 73 percent of the citizens polled were in favor of capital punishment. An ABA poll found 69 percent of lawyers and law students in favor of death sentences. A March 1981 Gallup poll, taken before the attempt on President Reagan's life, revealed that public support for imposing the death penalty for the crime of murder had reached its highest point in 28 years. The poll indicated that 66 percent—two out of every three—Americans favored the death penalty for persons convicted of capital crimes.

Mr. President, in conclusion I reiterate that the primary responsibility of society is to protect its members so that they may live their lives in peace and safety. In providing that protection, society must do what is necessary to deter those who may break the laws, and it must appropriately punish those who do break the laws.

I commend Senator THURMOND for his leadership in introducing this necessary legislation and I urge my colleagues to support this positive step to protect our society.

Thank you, Mr. President.

USE OR THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE IN FEDERAL COURTS

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, the Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, in strong support of a bill to modify the application of the exclusionary rule in Federal courts.

The bill would amend title 18 of the United States Code to allow otherwise admissible evidence to be used in Federal court proceedings, even if it was obtained through a violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, as long as the search or seizure which produced the evidence was "undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment."

The Supreme Court first held in the case of Weeks versus United States (1914) that evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment was inadmissible in a Federal criminal trial. Since its limited application in Weeks to exclude simple evidence of a crime, the exclusionary rule has been expanded to exclude contraband and the actual tools and instrumentalities of a crime. It has been further expanded to exclude evidence that was derived from other illegally seized evidence. Since the exclusionary rule is a judicially mandated rather than a constitutionally required response to fourth amendment violations, its reform through the legislative process is appropriate.

The primary, if not the sole, rationale for the application of the exclusionary rule is to deter fourth amendment violations by law enforcement personnel. The theory is that the exclusion of illegally seized evidence will deter law enforcement personnel from engaging in negligent or intentional practices that result in fourth amendment violations.

The problem arises when the rule is applied to exclude evidence seized in situations that a reasonably well-trained officer would not or could not have recognized as being in violation of the fourth amendment. The rule therefore loses any deterrent value it may have for more egregious violations of the fourth amendment. It simply results in a windfall for the criminal, who walks away unscathed despite the existence of reliable evidence of guilt.

If one considers the exclusion of evidence a remedy for one whose fourth amendment rights have been violated, then the problem is that it only rewards those who are actually guilty of a crime. It provides no recourse for innocent victims of police overaggressiveness, negligence, or international misconduct.

Mr. President, in deciding when the exclusionary rule should be applied, the Supreme Court has balanced the deterrent effect of the rule against the cost to society that would result from the distortion of the judicial process caused by depriving the prosecution of reliable, probative evidence of guilt. The bill would make clear the congressional determination that whatever minimal deterrent effect the exclusionary rule may have is outweighed by its cost to society in cases where the evidence to be excluded is the product of a search or seizure undertaken in a reasonable and good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment.

In the 1984 case of United States versus Leon, the Supreme Court upheld the use of evidence seized by officers acting in reasonable reliance on a search warrant, issued by a detached and neutral magistrate, that was later found to be invalid. The Supreme Court recognized in Leon that "indiscriminate application of the exclusionary rule—impeding the criminal justice system's truth finding function and allowing some guilty defendants to go free—may well generate disrespect for the law and the administration of justice." The bill introduced today incorporates the ruling of the Supreme Court that the exclusionary rule should be modified to permit the introduction of evidence obtained by officers reasonably relying on a warrant issued by a detached and neutral magistrate. It also permits the use of evidence seized in warrantless searches where the seizing officer was acting in a reasonable and good faith belief that his conduct conformed with the fourth amendment.

The exclusionary rule will still be applied in cases where police conduct is objectively and patently unreasonable or where it is based on a warrant which was acquired through intentional and material misrepresentation. Thus, the effect of the bill is simply to limit the use of the exclusionary rule in those cases in which its cost to society is grossly disproportionate to the minimal deterrent effect it may have on law enforcement officers.

Mr. President, legislation in this area is long overdue. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this effort, as they did the identical S. 1764 last year, so that the 99th Congress will effect a needed modification of the exclusionary rule.

Thank you, Mr. President,

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, in support of the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1985. It is designed to reform certain habeas corpus procedures that are currently in effect.

The writ of habeas corpus originated in the common law. Its importance was recognized by our Founding Fathers when they included in our Constitution a provision that "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." We know from history and the common law, however, that the habeas corpus proceedings to which the Founding Fathers referred in the Constitution were proceedings that sought an initial judicial determination of the legality of a detention imposed by an executive authority. The Founding Fathers did not have in mind proceedings that sought additional judicial reviews of the legality of a judicially imposed dentention.

After the Constitution was ratified, the availability of habeas corpus in the Federal courts was restricted to Federal prisoners, and the common law restrictions on the scope of the writ were generally observed. Unfortunately, however, the common law origins of the writ were gradually eroded during the last 100 years or so through statutory and case law development. During the last 30 years, the writ of habeas corpus has routinely served as a means for the lower Federal courts to review State criminal judgments on the grounds of alleged deprivation of Federal rights. In fact, the number of prisoners challenging the validity of their State Federal habeas corpus petitions rose nearly 700 percent from 1961 through 1982, according to a report prepared by the Bureau of Justice Statistics. It is that appalling situation that this bill is designed to redress.

According to our country's leading legal scholars on Federal procedure, the single most controversial and friction-producing issue in the relationship between the Federal courts and the States is Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners. State courts resent having their decisions reviewed by Federal judges, who in turn are unhappy about the burden of reviewing thousands of mostly frivolous petitions.

Several Supreme Court Justices have strongly criticized the current system of Federal habeas corpus, and have called for basic limitations on its scope and availability. Chief Justice Burger has urged Congress to consider restricting the availability of Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners because, in his view, "the administration of justice in this country is bogged down with lack of finality of judgments in criminal cases." As Justice Powell observed over 10 years ago in his opinion in Schneckloth versus Bustamonte:

> The present scope of habeas corpus tends to undermine the values inherent in our Federal system of Government. To the extent that every State criminal judgment is to be subject indefinitely to broad and repetitious Federal oversight, we render the actions of State courts a serious disrespect in derogation of the constitutional balance between the two systems.

It is to that very problem, so eloquently expressed by distinguished Supreme Court jurists, that this bill is addressed.

The bill establishes a standard for reviewing habeas corpus proceedings by according deference to State adjudications that are full and fair. That would be a vast improvement over the current rules, which provide, through habeas corpus proceedings, for mandatory readjudication, and that frequently result in duplicative relitigation of claims that have already been fairly considered by State trial and appellate courts.

The bill also would resolve the major uncertainties about access to Federal collateral remedies after a failure to raise a claim properly in normal criminal proceedings. It does that by establishing cause and prejudice as the exclusive governing standard.

In addition, the bill would establish a 1-year time limit on access to Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners, normally running from the time State remedies are exhausted. For similar purposes, it would prescribe a 3-year time limit on applications for collateral relief by Federal prisoners, normally running from finality of judgment.

The bill also addresses two technical issues that need to be remedied. First, it would make it clear that habeas corpus petition can be denied on the merits, notwithstanding the petitioner's failure to exhaust available State remedies. That change would eliminate the waste of time and effort that currently occurs when a frivolous petition is dismissed by a Federal court on grounds of nonexhaustion of State remedies but is later brought back to Federal court following its unsuccessful presentation.

Second, the bill would change the current rule that gives a State prisoner in a habeas corpus proceeding repeated opportunities to persuade a Federal district judge and then a circuit judge that an appeal is warranted. Similarly, it would bring the procedure governing access to appeal in collateral proceedings involving Federal prisoners into line with the procedure employed for habeas corpus proceedings for State prisoners.

I believe that the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1985 represents a rational, reasoned approach to a problem that has been developing for more than a century, a problem so great that it has led our country's leading jurists to ask us for specific legislative relief. I commend Senator THURMOND for his leadership role in introducing this necessary piece of legislation and I urge my colleagues to support the bill in order to facilitate the ability of our judicial system to dispense justice to all our citizens instead of unnecessarily wasting time and effort on a few people who exploit procedural loopholes in the law.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. CHILES. I am pleased to again join with Senator THURMOND, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in proposing legislation to reform the Federal habeas corpus law. We have worked together on the legislation since 1981. Last year we did pass this bill in the Senate and I am hopeful that it will be enacted into law in this Congress.

We all recognize that proposing changes in the habeas corpus statutes is not an easy thing to do. It is certainly something that we must consider carefully. But over the last few years, respected judges and legal scholars have called for a reexamination of our present system. Both Justice Black and Judge Friendly raised various questions about the easy availability in habeas corpus for State prisoners. Jim Smith, Florida's attorney general, has compiled a study of the use of the habeas corpus remedy over a period of several years. That study pointed to numerous instances of abuse in today's system. Chief Burger has stressed the need to recognize, "at some point finality of judgment" in our criminal justice system.

The bill that Senator THURMOND and I am introducing is designed to address some of the problems in the current system. The purpose of the bill is to give greater respect to orderly State court procedures and to instill the notion of finality of judgment into our State criminal justice systems.

There has been an explosion in the use of the habeas corpus writ by State prisoners to attack their State court convictions. The writ itself was first made available to State prisoners by a statute enacted by Congress in 1867. In 1953, in the Brown against Allen case, the Supreme Court interpreted the 1867 statute in such a way as to give Federal district courts broad authority to redetermine the merits of State court convictions. At that time, Justice Jackson expressed deep concern over the "flood of stale, frivolous, and repetitious petitions which will swamp the dockets of the lower courts and swell our own." Mr. Justice Jackson's observations have proven all too accurate, as prisoners have taken advantage of the easy availability of access to the Federal courts. In 1953, the flood consisted of 541 petitions. In the past 20 years, the filings of State prisoners habeas corpus petitions has dramatically increased by almost 700 percent.

I believe that the current state of affairs is harmful to the effective functioning of our courts, and to our criminal justice system. First of all, the easy availability of such review is at odds with one of the most fundamental principles of our judicial system: The notion of finality. Habeas cases relitigate the facts and issues that were decided in the State courts, either at trial or on direct appeal. We all recognize that finality in criminal cases will not carry the same weight it does in civil cases. But it does not follow that finality has no place at all in our criminal justice system. Yet, the current system operates in such a way as to suggest that a prisoner, duly convicted in a full and fair State proceeding, can challenge that conviction time and time again, for years or even decades after his State court conviction became final. Factual issues can end up being redetermined long after the crime was committed and the initial trial was held. In the meantime, evidence may have disappeared or key witnesses may no longer remember crucial details. The State is prejudiced by these long delays, and more importantly, the delays hurt the reliability of the fact finding process. Needless to say, extensive Federal court review of State court convictions can create unnecessary friction between the State court system and the Federal courts.

This lack of finality hampers the courts and the criminal justice system in other ways as well. An effective criminal justice system must let would be criminals know that they will be punished for committing crimes. This deterrence is not effective if prisoners have easy access to the Federal courts to file attacks on their convictions. As a result, the word gets out to would-be criminals that, even if you're caught and get sent to prison, you may not have to serve out your sentence. That message gets out to the public as well, and the result is an erosion of public confidence in the ability of the criminal justice system and the courts to deal with crime. Furthermore, the sheer volume of petitions filed is a strain on the resources of our courts. When our prosecutors, defense attorneys and judges devote their time and efforts to reviewing and processing these petitions, we end up diluting the resources of the courts. We add to the delay in bringing original criminal and civil cases to trial. Ironically, the flood of petitions may actually hurt those who have valid habeas claims. A large number of the claims filed are frivolous and repetitious, since many petitions can be filed without cost to the prisoner. This finding may prevent the worthy petitions from getting the consideration they deserve. As Justice Jackson observed, "(i)t must hurt the occasional meritorious petition to be buried in a flood of worthless ones."

The legislation we are introducing today is a carefully conceived measure that has been refined over several years of Senate consideration. It protects the right to a full and fair trial, but aims to rectify abuse of the writ of habeas corpus.

A prisoner would have to file his habeas petition while the evidence is still fresh—within a year. It establishes some limits on raising new claims as the basis for a petition when the prisoner failed to bring them up during State proceedings. And it provides that Federal courts must defer when a State court conviction has received a full and fair review by the State's appellate and supreme courts.

We need more finality in our criminal justice system. We need to avoid pointless relitigation of State cases and we need greater respect for our State court system. That is essential to maintaining public confidence in our system of justice.

I'm not sure that we have that today. In the words of one Supreme Court Justice, all too often, the State trial is more like a tryout on the road, and you don't get to Broadway until you start filing appeals in the Federal courts. All too often, we read about someone who is being released as a result of an appeal filed years or even decades after his original trial. All too often, those appeals are purely technical. They do not go to what should be the two fundamental issues in these cases: First, was the person filing the appeal innocent, and second, did that person get a fair trial. I believe that our State courts are capable of giving fair trials.

I believe that, if a person does not get a fair trial in the State courts, he should be entitled to one in the Federal courts. But I also believe that our criminal justice system cannot serve society if we allow any case to be reopened at any time, and on practically any grounds. These beliefs can be balanced. In today's system, however, I do not believe that they are balanced. This proposal is an attempt to strike a more equitable balance.

S. 240. A bill to amend the Uniform Time Act of 1966 to provide that daylight savings time commence each year on the first Sunday in March rather than the last Sunday in April; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ENERGY CONSERVATION DAYLIGHT SAVING ACT OF 1985

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON] in introducing legislation today to provide for the observance of daylight saving time for an 8-month period beginning the first Sunday of March and extending through the last Sunday in October.

Under the Uniform Time Act of 1966, daylight saving time is currently observed from the last Sunday in April until the last Sunday in October.

During the energy emergency of the early 1970's, and as recently as the 98th Congress, I introduced similar legislation to extend daylight saving time for an 8-month period on a permanent basis. I was especially pleased that legislation to extend daylight saving time was enacted—Public Law 93-434—in 1973 for a 2-year period in response to the energy emergency. At that time, daylight saving time was widely recognized as one way to help ease the surging demand for electricity by residential consumers.

Mr. President, while the immediate concerns over energy shortages and long lines at service stations have abated, the importance of continuing to encourage energy conservation is not questioned. Expanded daylight saving time could play a significant role in this regard as reported by Department of Transportation studies. Such studies following the 2-year experiment in 1973, suggest energy savings of approximately 100,000 barreis of oil equivalent per day during a 2-month extension. These savings are projected to occur as a result of reduced demand for residential electricity.

Beyond the immediate reduction in nationwide demand for electricity, the expanded period of daylight saving time, along with the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit, would remind us of our need to conserve energy and reduce the Nation's dependency on imported oil.

Mr. President, the benefits of an expanded daylight saving time extend beyond energy conservation. There would be immediate and noticeable effect on the quality of life for all Americans. These direct benefits include reductions in most categories of street crime and reductions in traffic accidents and fatalities.

The National Highway Transportation Safety Administration, for example, predicted there would be 200 fewer traffic fatalities per year if the observance of daylight saving time was extended to include March and April.

In response to the considerable concern over the schoolchildren waiting for school buses in the early morning hours, the National Safety Council and the Department of Transportation indicated that under extended daylight saving time in March and April, school age children would not be subject to greater involvement in accidents than the general population in any period of the day.

Another key benefit of the 2 additional months of daylight would be a nationwide reduction in most categories of street crime—a problem rapidly reaching epidemic proportions in our Nation. Statistics indicate that robbery, muggings, and other forms of violent crime are most frequently committed during the early evening hours. With the extra hour of daylight, at a time when most of the work force would be en route home, criminals would be less apt to threaten these individuals returning to their families.

Mr. President, I believe it is clear that the benefits of extending daylight saving time for the 2-month period far outweigh the continuation of the present 6-month period. The legislation proposed today impose no burden on the American taxpayer and require no further intrusion by the Federal Government in our daily lives, Furthermore, this legislation protects those States who opposed any expanded daylight saving by continuing the authority for any State to exempt itself from the provisions of the bill.

I commend my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON] for this important initiative and hope my colleagues will support this legislation to advance daylight saving time for the 2-month period including March and April.

S. 241. A bill to change the term of the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

TO CHANGE THE TERM OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would change the term of the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in order to make it approximately coterminus with that of the President of the United States. The term would end 1 year and 11 days after the expiration of the term of the President making the designation. To do so would not compromise the independence of the Fed, relative to present law, but would help insure that the policies of the Fed compliment those of the President.

When the citizens of this country vote for an administration, they have a right to a consistent expression of economic policy that is compatible with the philosophy and outlook of that administration. A mandate on economic policy should not be frustrated by fiscal and monetary policies that are contradictory.

While it is important for the Fed to maintain its independence, it makes little sense to continue a situation in which a new President could be forced to spend the first 2 or 3 years of his term with the Fed Chairman whose political and economic philosophies may be totally at odds with those of his administration

If we have learned anything from this recession that we are now recovering from, it is the power of monetary policy to influence the economy. I believe each new President should be given the opportunity to appoint a Fed chairman who can be expected to keep the Fed's policies in tune with the President's economic program.

S. 244. A bill to limit to the national median family income the amount of farm loss which may be deducted against nonfarm income by high-income taxpayers in competition with full-time, family-size operators; to the Committee on Finance.

TAX LOSS FARMING

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill designed to help preserve our family farm system while curbing a tax abuse and at the same time reducing the Federal deficit. My bill would limit to the national median household income—approximately $23,600—the amount of off-farm income which can be sheltered by farm losses.

As my colleagues will remember, I offered identical legislation in the last session of Congress. Since that time, I have received overwhelming support for my proposal from farmers, ranchers, agribusinesses, soil conservation groups and districts, and other concerned citizens. Additionally, I have received strong support from Farm Bureau, Farmers Union, American Agriculture Movement, National Farmers Organization, Grange, Women Involved in Farm Economics [WIFE], and other groups both in my home State of South Dakota and across the Nation. The National Governors Association also has endorsed the concepts embodied in my bill.

Very simply, Mr. President, my bill would close a glaring tax loophole which is aggravating our festering farm problems. Under our current tax code, bona fide farmers and ranchers must compete with so-called gentlemen farmers who are more interested in farming the Tax Code than in producing food and fiber. These gentlemen farmers compete with the bona fide family farmers and ranchers of America for farm and ranch land, add to our surplus production problems, and sometimes farm fragile or marginal lands, thus aggravating our soil and water conservation problems.

In addition to helping bona fide farmers and ranchers, my bill would make a very significant contribution to the goal of reducing the Federal deficit. The Joint Committee on Taxation has estimated my bill would garner a revenue gain to the Treasury of approximately $2.6 billion for fiscal years 1985–87. That amount is great by any calculation and should be considered carefully as we try to cut the deficit in order to lower interest rates and restore the value of the dollar to a more reasonable level. As my fellow farm-State colleagues are aware, high interest rates are crippling farmers and forcing many into bankruptcy or to abandon the land which has been in their family for generations. Additionally, our huge budget deficit has forced the dollar to record-high levels, thus making our agricultural exports noncompetitive in world markets.

One of the best farm programs we could write would be one which would reduce the deficit, lower the interest rates that our farmers and ranchers must pay to remain in operation, and make our farm products competitive in world markets. Toward these ends, my bill makes a significant contribution since it takes a $2.6 billion slash out of the Federal deficit.

The current raid on the Federal Treasury by "gentlemen" farmers is not gentlemanly at all. It is out-and-out robbery, and it should be stopped. It is a crime that our Federal tax laws allow wealthy individuals with large income to shelter thousands of dollars with farm losses. Furthermore, it is a social embarrassment that our tax laws encourage these investors to enter into direct competition with bona fide farmers and ranchers.

For years, politicians have stated that they are trying to save the family farm, and Congress has made attempts to do so. But, in actuality, these same politicians have fostered the demise of the family farm by creating and ignoring a tax loophole which has placed wealthy individuals with large amounts of off-farm income in direct competition with bona fide farmers and ranchers.

In a recent study of 1976 farm income tax returns, the Internal Revenue Service identified 12,000 returns which reported farm losses in excess of $50,000. These same returns showed an average off-farm income of $122,000. After deducting an average of over $104,000 in farm losses, these 12,000 so-called farmers paid taxes on an average adjusted gross income of just $16,362!

IRS found another 24,000 tax returns which recorded farm losses in the range of $25,000 to $50,000. These so-called farmers had an average off-farm income of almost $52,000 and after deducting average farm losses of $34,000, paid taxes on an average adjusted gross income of only $17,366!

I have requested the Treasury Department to prepare recent data on tax shelters in agriculture. Specifically, this information should enable Congress to determine the total loss to the Treasury, the commodities most often involved in tax sheltering, the occupations of tax-loss investors, the incomes of these investors, and the States and regions in which tax-loss farming is most prevalent.

Mr. President, tax abuse must be stopped and our Nation's bona fide farmers and ranchers must be relieved of the unfair and, in my opinion, the unethical competition of the tax-loss farmer. My bill would relieve farmers of this burden and would contribute at least $2.6 billion in revenues which could be used to reduce the deficit.

Tax shelters in agriculture must be demolished and I welcome the input, guidance, and assistance of my colleagues in addressing this important issue.

S. 245. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to repeal the requirement that contemporaneous records be kept to substantiate certain deductions and credits; to the Committee on Finance.

REPEAL OF LOGS ON BUSINESS VEHICLES

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to abolish the requirement that taxpayers maintain detailed log books for business vehicles.

Frankly, it's hard to believe that a rule such as this could be implemented in the United States. I just didn't think we'd ever come to the point where citizens would be required to inform the Government of every trip they make in a vehicle. In fact, it's worse than that. Taxpayers must record not only the destination of each trip, but also its purpose, time, date and mileage if they want to deduct the business expenses associated with the use of a vehicle from their taxes. Then, they have to be willing to submit those records to the IRS. This is "big brother" at is worst. Unfortunately, it's also been the law since January 1.

For my colleagues' information, as an indication of just how bad this regulation is, one of my constituents—a recent arrival as a refugee from Poland—has told me it is just like what the Communists make the people do in his homeland. He was given the choice of submitting to such big brotherism, going to prison, or leaving the country. Obviously, he chose to leave. God help us if we ever get to that point in this country, but in this regulation, we are not given cause for hope or complacency.

In case anyone's wondering how such a situation could ever come about, let me tell you. Last summer, Congress passed the so-called Deficit Reduction Act, a bill which ran well over 700 pages and required almost as many to explain. Somewhere, hidden deep between the covers of that statute, was the phrase "adequate contemporaneous records." Well, the IRS found those three words and blew them all out of proportion by issuing a ridiculous set of regulations.

Under those regulations, if a farmer drives to the end of the lane to get his mail, he has to keep a log. If he drives his pickup to church, he has to keep a log. If during the course of a day, between going to his fields, going home for lunch, and going into town for supplies, he makes 15 short trips in his truck, he must make 15 entries in his log book.

The same goes for the local businessman who makes deliveries with his truck, the real estate salesman who shows property to potential buyers, or the minister who visits shut-ins or makes hospital calls. In short, the IRS has concocted an outrageous, bureaucratic nightmare which affects ordinary Americans as they try to go about their business in their every day lives.

Why did they do it? Well, I've had numerous meetings and phone conversations with top Treasury Department officials about this boondoggle, and they keep telling me that this rule is necessary to nab tax-dodgers.

I've got news for them. This requirement isn't going to do the first thing to stop those who want to cheat the Government. It's just that now they're going to get a bigger kick out of doing it because they'll do it in a little different way. Anyone devious enough to cheat on their taxes isn't going to have any problem coming up with a few fake log entries at the end of a day to cover the miles they put on for their own personal use. No, the only people who are going to have trouble with this rule are those who are honest about their taxes and will attempt to comply with it—and that's most Americans.

If we want to go after loopholes, why don't we start with the 299 taxpayers who made over $200,000 last year and didn't pay a dime in taxes. Why when the IRS wants to crackdown on tax evaders, do the start with the "little guy?"

Mr. President, I don't want anybody to take me wrong. I'm all for nailing tax cheats. In fact, as chairman of the Senate subcommittee which controls funding for the IRS, I've done everything possible to provide the means necessary to see that honest taxpayers aren't left picking up more than their fair share of the tab as a result of those who cheat. But, this latest IRS brainstorm is ludicrous, and I'm not going to stand by and watch a runaway bureaucracy make life needlessly difficult for millions of honest, hard-working, Americans.

As I indicated, I have met personally a number of times with Treasury Department officials about this matter, including two face-to-face meetings with Assistant Secretary Designate for Tax Policy, Ronald Pearlman. I wish I could be optimistic about the possibility that Treasury will voluntarily address the problem in a way that will eliminate the paperwork burden on the typical taxpayer. However, this simply does not appear to be the direction in which the Treasury Department is moving.

Treasury Department officials on several occasions have briefed me on various watered-down versions of the vehicle log rule which they presently are considering. But, to this point, I simply haven't seen anything that goes far enough in eliminating the needless paperwork burden on farmers, ranchers, businessmen, and professionals. While I will certainly be interested to see what, if anything, the Department comes up with in the way of a revised regulation, it is imperative that the Congress move ahead legislatively to abolish the vehicle log rule.

Frankly, I haven't felt such a ground swell of public opinion on an issue since the dividend and interest withholding matter of 2 years ago. Having just returned from a week in my State, I can tell you that South Dakotans are fighting mad about this ill-advised regulation, and they have every right to be.

If representative government means anything in this country, we won't waste any time in passing this legislation and doing away with this latest mass of redtape which IRS would impose upon hard-working small businessmen, professionals, farmers, and ranchers. I urge my colleagues to join me in restoring a sense of reason and fairness to the way the Federal Government treats honest, law-abiding citizens who already have enough to worry about without imposing upon them yet another needless and wasteful, bureaucratic, make-work paperwork burden.

S. 246. A bill for the relief of Peter Lyn Johnson; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF PETER LYN JOHNSON

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, Peter Lyn Johnson is a resident of Minnesota, with his wife and two young sons, in Bimidji, MN. He is a Vietnam era veteran. During the course of his service, he was misdiagnosed by the U.S. Navy as being the victim of mental illness. In fact, Peter Lyn Johnson has a rare, almost never-occurring form of epilepsy. Obviously, there is a substantial distinction between the two, and it also should be obvious that in matters of employment, matters of credit, and a variety of other areas, that distinction drawn by the U.S. Navy in a most inappropriate way has been harmful to Mr. Johnson and his family and needs desperately to be corrected.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall—

(A) except as provided in paragraph (3), delete from all records maintained by the Veterans' Administration relating to Peter Lyn Johnson, xxx-xx-xxxx, C 22 960 052, any term or reference which reflects or implies an opinion that Peter Lyn Johnson has or has had a mental or personality disorder or a mental or emotional dysfunction; and

(B) transmit to Peter Lyn Johnson a photocopy of all such records promptly after the requirement set out in clause (A) has been met.

(2) The Secretary of the Navy shall—

(A) except as provided in paragraph (3), delete from all records maintained by the Department of the Navy relating to the said Peter Lyn Johnson any term or reference which reflects or implies an opinion that Peter Lyn Johnson has or has had a mental or personality disorder or a mental or emotional dysfunction; and

(B) transmit to Peter Lyn Johnson a photocopy of all such records promptly after the requirement set out in clause (A) has been met.

(3) Paragraphs (1)(A) and (2)(A) shall not apply to any term or reference reflecting a diagnosis of or treatment for temporal lobe epilepsy.

(4) This subsection shall not affect the award of disability compensation to which section 2 applies.

(b)(1) Each custodian of any record which includes copies of or reports based on records to which paragraph (1)(A) or (2)(A) of subsection (a) applies shall delete from the record each term or reference described in such paragraph other than a term or reference described in paragraph (3) of such subsection.

(2) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs (with respect to records to which subsection (a)(1)(A) applies) and the Secretary of the Navy (with respect to records to which subsection (a)(2)(A) applies) shall—

(A) transmit to each individual or entity to which such records or reports based on such records have been transmitted by the Veterans' Administration or the Department of the Navy before the date of enactment of this Act a notice setting out the requirements of paragraph (1); and

(B) transmit to the said Peter Lyn Johnson a complete list of the names and addresses of all individuals and entities described in clause (A).

SEC. 2. (a) Notwithstanding section 3010(a) of title 38, United States Code, the award of one-hundred percent service-connected disability compensation resulting from the decision of the Board of Veterans' Appeals in the case of the said Peter Lyn Johnson, docket number 71-11 026, is effective October 16, 1965.

(b) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall pay to Peter Lyn Johnson, out of funds available in the Treasury of the United States for the payment of veterans' disability compensation, disability compensation in an amount equal to the total amount of disability compensation Peter Lyn Johnson would have been entitled to receive from the Veterans' Administration for the period beginning October 16, 1965, and ending November 9, 1969 (the day before the date the award referred to in subsection (a) was made effective by the Veterans' Administration), had the Veterans' Administration made such award effective October 16, 1965.

SEC. 3. (a)(1) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall pay the reasonable costs of qualifying hospital care or medical services which are furnished to the said Peter Lyn Johnson by any source other than the Veterans' Administration and, under section 111 of title 38, United States Code, the reasonable travel and incidental expenses incurred in connection with such hospital care or medical services.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1), hospital care or medical services qualify if—

(A) the care or services are the same type of hospital care or medical services Peter Lyn Johnson is entitled to receive from the Veterans' Administration under chapter 17 of title 38, United States Code; and

(c) Payments made for hospital care or medical services under subsection (a) shall be paid out of funds available in the Treasury of the United States to pay for contract hospital care or medical services furnished under chapter 17 ot title 38, United States Code.

(1) hospital care and medical services furnished to, and

(2) related travel and incidental expenses incurred by or on behalf of,

Peter Lyn Johnson on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 4. (b) Suit upon any such claim may be instituted at any time within one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the United States.

S. 247. A bill to allow the State of Wisconsin to use the proceeds of veterans' mortgage bonds for the purpose of acquiring or replacing mortgages of veterans who were unable to obtain veterans' bond financing because of a court challenge to the constitutionality of such State's borrowing power; to the Committee on Finance.

WISCONSIN VETERANS' RELIEF ACT OF 1985

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will help to correct an injustice that an estimated 39 Wisconsin veterans and their families face as a result of a bureaucratic snafu.

These veterans had applied for a home loan through the Wisconsin Veterans' Home Loan Program. But as their applications were being approved in August 1983, two State legislators filed suit to challenge the Wisconsin Legislature's authority to issue bonds in excess of $750 million to fund State-administered programs. In response to the suit, the Governor was compelled to suspend a number of loan programs, including the Veterans' Home Loan Program.

Six weeks later, the State supreme court rejected the suit, but by that time, these 39 veterans were forced to secure commercial funding elsewhere. Thus, despite their eligibility for this program, they were denied the benefits of the program for political reasons totally beyond their control.

For each of these families, the Governor's office has estimated that this bureaucratic snafu is costing them an additional $120 in mortgage interest payments each and every month.

The Wisconsin Legislature recognized the injustice that these families faced and has adopted legislation, which Governor Earl has signed, to make these families eligible to convert their commercial loans to the veterans' home loans to which they are properly entitled.

But, unfortunately, the Wisconsin legislation does not completely solve their problem since the Internal Revenue Code prohibits such a conversion of their mortgages. Therefore, my bill will provide a one-time opportunity for these veterans to apply to convert their mortgages to the veterans' home loan program for which they have always been eligible.

There is no reason that these families should be denied benefits to which they are eligible because of a political dispute over issuance of State bonds. This bill will remedy that injustice.

I am particularly indebted to LES ASPIN, who has carried the ball on this issue in the House of Representatives, and invested many hours in developing this proposal with Governor Earl's staff and I am delighted to lend my support by introducing this proposal here in the Senate.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 248. A bill to reduce the rates of pay for Members of Congress by 10 percent; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TEN-PERCENT PAY REDUCTION FOR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, during his recent consideration of the fiscal year 1986 Federal budget, President Reagan called for a 5-percent decrease in the wages and salaries of Federal employees. Many millions of Americans have been called upon to make sacrifices as well during the past several years. Members of Congress should be setting an example to demonstrate their commitment to reduced spending. To do otherwise is to indicate that the Congress is not willing to share in the sacrifices demanded of others. With this in mind, I rise today to reintroduce legislation to reduce the compensation of Members of Congress by 10 percent which I originally introduced as a Member of the House of Representatives in 1975.

During my years as a Congressman in the House of Representatives and as a Senator, I have consistently voted against raising our compensation. I feel such congressional pay raises fly in the face of our efforts to reduce Federal spending and control our runaway deficit.

The Federal budget deficit has soared beyond belief in the past 10 years. Since 1974, Congressmen and Senators have received pay increases amounting to an additional $30,000 for each legislator in 1984. This is unconscionable when millions of Americans have been willing to take pay cuts and reduced hours to bring about economic recovery.

I ask today that my colleagues in Congress join me in cosponsoring this legislation. By cutting its own pay, Congress will gain far more credibility in asking for the social welfare sacrifices implicit in the upcoming budget debate. If we all work together, we can regain fiscal discipline within this body, but it must begin with ourselves.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 249. A bill to amend the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

UNIFORM RELOCATION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I introduce for the third and, hopefully, final time, the Uniform Relocation Act Amendments of 1985. This bill comprehensively amends the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 to make its administration more equitable and efficient at all levels of government.

As my colleagues are aware, the Committee on Governmental Affairs has twice reported, and the Senate has twice unanimously passed identical and essentially similar amendments to the Uniform Act. In fact, the bill I introduce today is identical to S. 531, which Senators SASSER, LEVIN, and I sponsored in the 98th Congress.

Mr. President, as all who have ever been displaced by a Federal project know, the Uniform Act occupies an important place in our system of laws; it protects individuals from having to bear a disproportionate cost of well-intentioned programs designed to benefit the public. But the act has its flaws, which have been well-documented in Senate hearings. Its coverage is limited, its payment schedule unfair. And the act's many administrative requirements impose unreasonable burdens on both recipients and State and local administrators alike.

The noncontroversial amendments proposed in S. 249 would provide a much-needed update to the 1970 act. The legislation would raise benefit levels to compensate for inflation. It would considerably broaden the act's coverage to cover more kinds of displacements. It would delegate substantial administrative discretion to State and local governments to reduce regulatory costs. And it would institute a range of management reforms and technical adjustments to the act, with the goal of making its administration more rational and efficient.

Mr. President, this bill enjoys the support of the Reagan administration and all the major State and local interest groups. It has no opponents. Its supporters include the National Governors Association, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Official and the American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials. Interest groups respresenting tenant rights have also played a major role in the bill's development, as have members of the small business, nonprofit, appraisal and utility communities.

Given this broad-based support and participation, and the fact that the House adopted an essentially similar bill during the last days of the 98th Congress, I am optimistic that we will finally see our efforts come to fruition in the 99th Congress. I would like to thank all of the past supporters of this legislation for their efforts. And I would urge them to work with me this one last time to assure the long-delayed passage of these important amendments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 249 and a section-by-section analysis be included in the RECORD following this statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 249

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Uniform Relocation Act Amendments of 1985".

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

DEFINITIONS

"DECLARATION OF FINDINGS AND POLICY

"SEC. 201. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

"(1) displacement as a direct result of programs or projects undertaken by a Federal agency or with Federal financial assistance is caused by a number of activities, including rehabilitation, demolition, code enforcement, and acquisition;

"(2) displacement occurs in a variety of social, economic, geographic, and legal circumstances;

"(3) relocation assistance policies must provide for sufficient flexibility to assure fair, uniform, and equitable treatment of all affected persons;

"(4) the displacement of business often results in their closure; and

"(5) minimizing the adverse impact of displacement of businesses is essential to maintaining the economic and social well-being of communities.

"(b) This title establishes a uniform policy for the fair and equitable treatment of persons displaced as a direct result of programs or projects undertaken by a Federal agency or with Federal financial assistance, in order that such persons shall not suffer disproportionate injuries as a result of programs designed for the benefit of the public as a whole.

"(c) It is the intent of Congress that—

"(1) the primary purpose of this title is to minimize the hardship of displacement on persons displaced as a direct result of programs or projects undertaken by a Federal agency or with Federal financial assistance;

"(2) Federal agencies shall carry out this law in a manner which minimizes waste, fraud, and mismanagement;

"(3) the administration of this Act shall, to the maximum extent feasible, minimize unnecessary administrative and program costs borne by States and State agencies through the promulgation of economical regulatory requirements and the delegation of substantial administrative discretion to State and local governments;

"(4) uniform procedures for the administration of relocation assistance shall, to the maximum extent feasible, assure that the unique circumstances of any displaced person are taken into account and that persons in essentially similar circumstances are accorded equal treatment under this Act; and

"(5) the improvement of housing conditions of economically disadvantaged persons under this title shall be undertaken, to the maximum extent feasible, in coordination with existing Federal, State, and local governmental programs for accomplishing such goals."

Such payment shall consist of a fixed payment in an amount to be determined according to criteria established by the head of the lead agency, except that such payment shall not be less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000. A person whose sole business is renting displacement property to others shall not qualify for this payment.".

(d) Section 202 of the Uniform Act (42 U.S.C. 4622) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(d)(1) For the purposes of this section and section 101(6)—

"(B) The term 'utility' means any electric, gas, water, steam power or materials transmission or distribution system, any transportation system, or any communications sytem (including cable television), and any fixtures, equipment, or other property appropriate to the operation, maintenance, or repair of the foregoing. A utility may be publicly, privately, or cooperatively owned.

"(2) Except when provided otherwise by Federal law, whenever a federally assisted program or project undertaken by a displacing agency other than a Federal agency will result in the displacement of a utility from property under the ownership or control of a State or local agency, the head of the displacing agency shall provide a payment to the utility company pursuant to State or local law or a written contract, if any, between the utility company and the State or local agency, but in no event shall such payment exceed the actual reasonable cost of relocation of such utility.

"(3) Nothing in this subsection shall supercede a State or local law or a written contract between a utility company and a State or local government, or require a payment to be made where none is required under State or local law or a written contract.

"(4) Nothing in this subsection shall deprive a utility company of its rights under State or local law.

"(5) Nothing in this subsection shall require a Federal agency to increase its payment if the increased payment is attributable to a contract or contract amendment that is made in anticipation of the Federal payment.

"(6) Nothing in this subsection shall require a Federal payment in excess of the payment that a State or local agency would pay if no Federal funds were involved.

"(7) Nothing in this subsection confers jurisdiction on a court of the United States (as defined in section 451 of title 28, United States Code) to review any action of a displacing agency in carrying out this subsection or to review the right of a utility to be compensated State or local law.

"(e) Whenever a program or project directly undertaken by a Federal agency will result in the displacement of a utility as the result of Federal acquisition of real property under the ownership or control of a State or local agency, the head of the Federal agency shall either relocate the utility with the utility company's consent, or provide a payment to the utility equal to the actual reasonable cost of relocation of such utility. Such relocation or such payment shall not be required when it is provided otherwise by a Federal law, or a Federal regulation promulgated prior to March 17, 1983, or a contract or agreement with a Federal agency.".

Such amount shall be paid only if the dwelling acquired by the displacing agency was encumbered by a bona fide mortgage which was a valid lien on such dwelling for not less than one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of negotiations for the acquisition of such dwelling."; and

(5) by striking out paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) The additional payment authorized by this section shall be made only to a displaced person who purchases and occupies a decent, safe, and sanitary replacement dwelling within one year after the date on which such person receives final payment from the displacing agency for the acquired dwelling or the date on which the displacing agency's obligation under section 205(c)(3) of this Act is met, whichever is later, except that the displacing agency may extend such period for good cause. If such period is extended, the payment under this section shall be based on the costs of relocating the person to a suitable replacement dwelling within one year of such date.".

Such payment shall consist of the amount necessary to enable such person to lease or rent for a period not to exceed three years, a suitable replacement dwelling. For a person whose income exceeds 50 per centum of the median income of the area, as determined by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, the amount referred to shall equal the lesser of (i) $4,500 or (ii) 36 times the amount obtained by subtracting the monthly housing costs for the displacement dwelling from the monthly housing costs for a suitable replacement dwelling. At the discretion of the head of the displacing agency, a payment under this subsection may be made in periodic installments.

"(b) Any displaced person eligible for payments under subsection (a) of this section may elect to receive in lieu thereof either Federal low income housing assistance or similar State or local governmental assistance if such assistance is available at the time of displacement and such person is otherwise eligible for such assistance. The failure of any such person to make such an election shall be considered when evaluating the eligibility of such person for any Federal or federally assisted low income housing assistance program during the three years following the date on which such person received the payment authorized under subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) Any person eligible for a payment under subsection (a) of this section may elect to apply such payment to a downpayment on, and other incidental expenses pursuant to, the purchase of a decent, safe, and sanitary replacement dwelling. A displaced homeowner who has occupied the displacement dwelling for at least ninety days but not more than one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of negotiations for the aquisition of such dwelling may, at the discretion of the head of the displacing agency, be eligible for the maximum payment allowed under this subsection: Provided, That such payment shall not exceed the payment such person would otherwise have received under section 203(a) of this Act had the person occupied the displacement dwelling for one hundred and eighty days immediately prior to the initiation of such negotiations.".

RELOCATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION AND ADVISORY SERVICES

SEC. 205. Section 205 of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4625) and its catchline are amended to read as follows:

"RELOCATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION AND ADVISORY SERVICES

"SEC. 205. (a) The head of any displacing agency shall assure that the relocation assistance advisory services described in subsection (c) of this section are made available to all persons displaced by such agency. If such agency head determines that any person occupying property immediately adjacent to the property where the displacing activity occurs is caused substantial economic injury as a result thereof, the agency head may make available to such person such advisory services.

"(b) The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development shall assign a high priority for assistance under the programs referred to in sections 204(b) and 206(b) of this Act to persons eligible under such sections. To the extent practicable, the Secretary shall require that federally assisted State and local governmental low income housing assistance programs assign priority for assistance to such persons. To the extent practicable, the Administrator of the Small Business Administration and the heads of other Federal agencies administering programs which may be of assistance to displaced persons shall make available technical assistance under subsection (c)(5) of this section and expedite the applications for such assistance by such persons.

"(c) Each relocation assistance advisory program required by subsection (a) of this section shall include such measures, facilities, or services as may be necessary or appropriate in order to—

"(2) provide current and continuing information about sales prices and rental charges on suitable replacement dwellings for displaced homeowners and tenants and suitable locations for businesses and farm operations;

"(4) assist a person displaced from a business or farm operation in obtaining and becoming established in a suitable replacement location;

"(5) supply information concerning other Federal programs which may be of assistance to displaced persons, and technical assistance to such persons in applying for assistance under such programs;

"(6) provide other advisory services to displaced persons in order to minimize hardships to such persons in adjusting to relocation; and

"(7) assure that a one hundred and eighty day homeowner-occupant is given a reasonable opportunity to remain in such occupancy status.

"(d) The head of a displacing agency shall coordinate the relocation activities performed by such agency with other Federal, State, or local governmental actions in the community which could affect the efficient and effective delivery of relocation assistance and related services.

"(e) Whenever two or more Federal agencies provide financial assistance to a displacing agency other than a Federal agency, to implement functionally or geographically related activities which will result in the displacement of a person, the heads of such Federal agencies may by agreement designate one such agency as the cognizant Federal agency whose procedures shall be utilized to implement the activities. If such agreement cannot be reached, then the head of the lead agency shall designate one such agency as the cognizant agency. Such related activities constitute a single program or project for purposes of this Act.".

The head of the lead agency shall require that this section may be used to exceed the payment ceilings established in sections 203 and 204 only on a case-by-case basis, for good cause.

"(b) Whenever housing replacement as a last resort will result in the provision of housing for persons who are otherwise eligible for low income housing assistance, the requirement that the displacing agency provide suitable replacement housing may be met through such assistance as the provision of a certificate of family participation under the existing section 8 housing program pursuant to the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1437f).".

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—S. 249

DEFINITIONS

Section 101(a). Section 101(1). This section eliminates reference in the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970 (hereinafter the Uniform Act) to the National Capital Housing Authority and the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency. If the proposed amendments are enacted, these entities are included in the new definition of "State agency," as having power of eminent domain.

Section 101(b). Section 101(3). This section expands the definition of a "State agency" to include a private corporation that has the power to take private property for public use (eminent domain).

Section 101(d). Section 101(6). The definition of "displaced person" for the purposes of triggering certain benefits—moving costs (section 202 (a) and (b)) and advisory services (section 205)—is expanded to include persons directly displaced through Federal or federally assisted substantial rehabilitation or demolition activities. Residential tenants displaced by non-acquisition activities are not presently covered under the Act, but many are covered by separate relocation regulations. The expanded definition of "displaced person" consolidates under the Uniform Act different Housing and Urban Development regulations requiring relocation assistance for residential tenants directly displaced by Federal or federally assisted non-acquisition activities. It also ensures that residential tenants displaced by such programs do not have uneven rights and entitlements solely due to the type of displacing activity. In addition, a provision is included for the head of the lead agency to establish criteria for determining eligibility of unlawful occupants in the displacement dwelling, and for those persons who may occupy solely for the purposes of obtaining assistance. This section also circumscribes eligibility for utility companies whose transmission lines are moved as a result of any Federal or federally assisted project, to receive moving payments under Section 202 in connection with such lines. The rationale for this is that public utility transmission lines occupy public rights-of-way under various terms and conditions established by State and local agencies. These terms and conditions may be established by franchise agreement, State law, court decisions, or administrative practices (e.g., Comptroller General and agency rulings). In general, public utilities are allowed to use public rights-of-way, without charge or at a nominal fee to cover administrative costs, with the explicit provision that the utilities may be required to remove, relocate or adjust their transmission lines at the request of the public agency having jurisdiction. The intent of this provision is not to deprive utilities of their rights under contract or State and local law, but to ensure that this Act does not unintentionally interfere in such matters, as happened recently in the case entitled "C&P Telephone Company vs. Norfolk Redevelopment and Housing Authority and Housing and Urban Development" (No. 81-1602, 3/25/82). This provision would allow certain prior agreements to prevail.

Also, the term "displaced person" does not include any person who moves or moves property or operations from real property under the ownership or control of a Federal, State or local agency pursuant to the terms of a lease, license, land use permit, or other arrangements for the use of such property, unless such person was an owner-occupant or tenant of the real property immediately prior to acquisition by a displacing agency.

Section 101(e). Section 101 is expanded by adding three new definitions:

Section 101(10) "Suitable Replacement Dwelling". This term is to be used in place of "Comparable Replacement Dwelling" wherever it occurs in the Uniform Act.

This change is designed to be somewhat more flexible, without compromising a person's right to be made whole.

In this version "affordable" has been deleted from the term "suitable replacement dwelling" and within the persons "financial means" inserted. This is intended to clarify the term "affordable" without changing its intent or meaning. The clause "functionally similar" is designed to make the suitability standard closer to the comparability standard under current law.

Section 101(11) "Displacing Agency". This term is established to consolidate under a single term all the sources of displacement, including Federal agencies, States, and persons furnished Federal financial assistance, for the purpose of making the law easier to read, understand, and implement.

Section 101(12). "Lead Agency". This term defines the department, agency, or other body that shall be designated by the President pursuant to section 213 to implement and coordinate uniform government-wide regulations under this Uniform Act.

POLICY

Section 201. Section 201. This section, which presently stipulates that the Uniform Act is to provide for the fair and equitable treatment of persons displaced by Federal or federally assisted programs designed for the benefit of the public, is significantly expanded under a new Statement of Findings and Policy.

Section 201(a). The findings subsection establishes that federally caused displacement occurs under rehabilitation and demolition activities, as well as acquisition activities; that flexibility in administration of the Uniform Act to meet the unique circumstances of displaced persons is fair and equitable; and that minimizing the adverse impact displacements have on businesses is vital to the economic well-being of communities.

Section 201(b). The Policy subsection states that the administration of the Uniform Act shall minimize unnecessary administrative and program costs borne by State and local governments through economical regulations and the delegation of substantial discretion under the Uniform Act to the States; that Federal agencies shall implement steps to minimize waste, fraud, and mismanagement; that uniformity should be subordinate to the need for flexibility in administering the Uniform Act; that persons in essentially similar circumstances are to be accorded equal treatment; and that there is a distinction between the Uniform Act's goals of minimizing the hardship of displacement on individuals and improving the housing conditions of the poor, indicating that the latter be integrated with existing housing programs as much as possible. A major purpose of these revisions is to ensure that uniformity exists among Federal regulations, but at the local level unique circumstances should be taken into consideration. However, where the circumstances of two or more persons are in most respects essentially similar—a relatively narrow concept—then the accordance of uniform rights and entitlements under the Uniform Act is intended.

MOVING AND RELATED EXPENSES

Section 202. Section 202(a). The section is rewritten to make it easier to understand. Also, a subsection is added (Section 202(a)(4)) to the effect that reasonable expenses, of up to $10,000, necessary to reestablish a non-profit organization or business at a new site are compensable under the Uniform Act. The additional amount, though not large, should help non-profit organizations or businesses adjust to displacement. This is to correct the problem is the present law that non-profit organizations and businesses receive substantially fewer rights and entitlements under the Uniform Act than do individuals. Under current practice some of the cost of public policy is passed on to the business sector, notwithstanding the fact that individuals own businesses and may suffer severe economic harm as a result of displacement. Finally, the intent is to make this benefit available to those businesses being reestablished, not those going out of business.

Section 202(b). This section is amended to eliminate the ceiling and floor on the amount paid in lieu of itemized expenses for moving and other expenses associated with relocating, and delegates the setting of such payments to the head of the lead agency. Removing the ceiling allows the payments to be adjusted upward for inflation. This corrects the incentive for persons to itemize actual expenses and thereby increase the attendant paperwork burden, when the in lieu payment is so low as to be uneconomical. Removal of the floor will help to avoid windfalls presently resulting when persons are displaced from missions or "flop houses."

Section 202(c). This section is amended to raise the current $10,000 ceiling on the amount a displaced business or farm operation may receive in lieu of itemized expenses for moving and other expenses associated with relocating to $20,000; to delete the requirement that this amount be determined based on the annual income of such concern in favor of criteria to be developed by the head of the lead agency; and to require that persons whose sole business was the renting of the displacement property to others shall not qualify for this payment. The increased ceiling is to adjust the ceiling for inflation, since it is currently so low as to make it economic for businesses to itemize actual expenses and increase the paperwork burdens of implementing agencies accordingly. The new payment criteria are established to provide displacing agencies with greater flexibility. The current criteria have proven very difficult to administer. Finally, the restricted definition of a business is to prevent windfalls and abuses presently benefiting owners of rental property who have little or nothing to move.

REPLACEMENT HOUSING FOR HOMEOWNER

Section 203. Section 203(a). This section is amended to raise the maximum payment from $15,000 to $22,500. The existing $15,000 payment is no longer adequate. Because of the increase in cost of housing over the past decade a majority of Federal agencies frequently must use the last resort housing provision. Justification to use the last resort provision is time consuming and a costly administrative burden. In order to avoid this burden, along with its attendant costs, and to compensate for inflation over the last ten years when the ceiling was first established, the ceiling is now being increased to $22,500. This section also eliminates the requirement that persons be relocated to comparable replacement dwellings in favor of a requirement to relocate such persons to suitable replacement dwellings (section 203(a)(1)(A)); to change the method by which persons are compensated for higher mortgage payments for their replacement dwellings to reflect current market conditions through the use of the "buy-down" method (Section 203(a)(1)(B)); to allow the head of the displacing agency to extend, for good cause, the one-year period in which a person must relocate to a replacement dwelling in order to receive a payment under this section, except that payments are to be computed based on the one-year rule; and to allow him to waive the requirement that persons relocate to decent, safe, but sanitary housing for good cause due to the unique circumstances of the displaced person. The corrected computation formula is to eliminate a number of unintended windfalls occurring under the present law. The one year rule is to clarify a displacing agency's obligation under the Uniform Act where displacement is substantially later than the final payment date—a continuing source of controversy. This is because when agencies lease back property to the displacee for a period of years, inflated land and relocation costs may be significantly higher at the actual time of acquisition. However, an agency waiver of the one-year rule is included as a fairness provision.

REPLACEMENT HOUSING FOR TENANTS AND CERTAIN OTHERS

Section 204. Section 204(a). This section is amended to replace the requirement that relocation be to a comparable replacement dwelling and to increase the $4,000 ceiling to $4,500. The existing $4,000 payment, like the payment under section 203(a), is not adequate in light of the existing housing market and for the same reasoning as stated under section 205(a) this ceiling is increased to $4,500 and the time period placed at three years. In addition, the suitability standard is substituted to avoid windfalls under the comparability standard. The revised payment formula is to reflect the intent that rental subsidies should be based on the person's willingness and ability to pay housing costs as determined by the amount of their income devoted to housing.

Section 204(b). This section is amended explicitly to allow persons eligible to receive a payment under this section, who are otherwise eligible for low income housing assistance programs that are either federally administered or assisted, to elect instead to receive such housing assistance, provided that it is available, but where such person opts for the cash payment, this is to be taken into account by Federal or federally assisted agencies when determining such person's eligibility for public housing assistance during the two years following the date on which such person received the cash payment. This is to eliminate windfalls that benefit persons who receive double housing subsidies.

Section 204(c). This section is amended to eliminate the requirement that persons who elect to apply the amount allowed under this section toward a downpayment on, and expenses pursuant to, the purchase of a replacement dwelling match any amount $2,000; to provide that payments under this subsection not be more than they would be under subsection (a); to provide that such person is not to receive other governmental assistance toward such purchase other than federally insured or guaranteed loans or any amount in excess of what he would have received under 203(a); and to provide that homeowners who do not meet the 180-day residency requirements, but meet the 90-day residency requirements for tenants, remain eligible for the full $4,500 payment under this section, as is currently the case. The elimination of the matching requirements is to eliminate the burdensome paperwork that occurs under the current procedure. The limit of payments to the amount the person would otherwise have been eligible for under subsection (a) is to eliminate the use of higher payments as an inducement to homeownership.

RELOCATION ASSISTANCE COORDINATION AND ADVISORY SERVICES

Section 205. Section 205(a). This section is amended to require the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to assign a high priority for assistance to persons who choose under section 204(b) to receive public housing assistance instead of a cash payment; to assure that other Federal agencies, whose programs are of assistance to displaced persons to take practicable measures to provide technical assistance in preparing applications for such programs; and to expedite the consideration of such applications. This is to ensure better coordination of governmental programs, and to target such resources more effectively toward minimizing the hardships that result from Federal programs.

Section 205(b). This section is amended to eliminate the requirement to provide information on the availability of comparable replacement dwellings in favor of suitable replacement dwellings; to include farm operations among the businesses for which information on alternative locations must be provided; and to eliminate the requirement that a person not be made to move unless given a reasonable choice of opportunities to move to a comparable dwelling in favor of a suitable replacement dwelling. The substitution of suitability for comparability is based on the same rationale as established in Section 101(10). The inclusion of farm operations under this provision is for equity purposes.

Section 205(e). This section is added to require that when two or more Federal agencies are providing assistance to a geographically or functionally related activity, the agencies will agree on a cognizant agency whose procedures will apply to such activities. This is to eliminate red tape and paperwork burdens where regulations may be the same, but procedures differ. It will also serve to equalize payments. However, the intent is also that such cognizant agencies be established on a project-by-project basis, not in perpetuity.

HOUSING REPLACEMENT BY FEDERAL AGENCY AS LAST RESORT

Section 206. Section 206(a). This section is amended to establish that the unavailability of suitable as opposed to comparable replacement sale or rental dwellings will determine whether last resort housing must be provided; subject to lead agency certification, States may establish statewide standards for the use of this section, provided that these standards require that persons in essentially similar circumstances are accorded equal treatment. Where there is no State law, the lead agency shall promulgate a regulation to the effect that this section may not be used to exceed the payment ceilings under sections 203 and 204, except on a case-by-case basis, for good cause. The substitution of suitability for comparability is based on the same reasons established under Section 101(10). The transfer of regulatory responsibilities to the States is to provide greater flexibility than is now the case.

Section 206(b). This subsection is added to establish that a displacing agency's obligation to provide replacement housing under this section shall be met, whenever practicable, with existing public housing programs. This is to emphasize the need for greater coordination of government programs.

AGENCY CERTIFICATION OF STATE PROGRAMS

Section 207. Section 210. This section is amended to authorize the head of the lead agency to certify a State agency if the State enacts a State law similar in purpose and effect as the Federal statute. This is intended to delegate authority to those States which desire to take on the statewide administrative responsibility of monitoring displacing agency implementation of the Federal statute.

FEDERAL SHARE OF COST

Section 208. Section 211(a). This section is amended to delete outdated language establishing coverage under the Uniform Act for projects undertaken before July 1971. "State agency" is expanded to include "displacing agency" for the purpose of clarity.

Section 211(b). This Section is amended to expand the payments a displacing agency is eligible to receive when such payment serves essentially the same purpose as those provided for in the Uniform Act. This is to give States greater flexibility in designing relocation assistance programs than is now the case.

REGULATION AND ADJUDICATION

Section 209. Section 213. This section is amended to require the President to establish a lead agency function in a department, agency or other body. The lead agency shall issue uniform, government-wide regulations for use by all Federal agencies in administering the Uniform Act; coordinates, with the assistance of other agencies, relocation activities under subchapter II of the Uniform Act with Federal and federally assisted public housing programs; and performs other duties that pertain to the purposes of the Uniform Act. The uniform regulatory requirement is to eliminate burdensome paperwork imposed on State and local governments caused by multiple Federal agency regulations.

TRANSFER OF SURPLUS PROPERTY

Section 210. Section 218. This section is amended to establish that the amount to be paid to the General Services Administration by a State after it disposes of surplus property transferred to the State by the Federal government pursuant to a Federal or federally assisted project will reflect only the net amounts received for such property, rather than all amounts as is currently the case. This compensates the States for the cost of marketing such property.

REPEALS

Section 211. Sections 214, 215, 217, and 219 are repealed.

(a) Section 214. This section, which pertains to the requirement to submit a report on displacement, and which lapsed in 1975, is repealed.

(b) Section 215. This section, pertaining to the authority of the head of any Federal agency to make loans for planning for relocation assistance activities by non-profit organizations, etc., is repealed because this provision has never been implemented, and Section 206 is the authority to ensure housing is provided.

(c) Section 217. This section is repealed. It pertains to the Uniform Act's applicability to the Department of Housing and Urban Development programs, which are now being passed out.

(d) Section 219. This section, which pertains to the Uniform Act's applicability to a now defunct program in New York City, is repealed.

REAL PROPERTY ACQUISITION

Section 301(2). Section 301(2). This section is amended to allow the head of the lead agency to forego an appraisal. The foregoing of an appraisal is to provide greater flexibility for Federal, State, and local governments, under criteria developed by the lead agency. to cut red-tape and achieve greater economy in the overhead cost involved with establishing just compensation.

Section 301(b). Section 301(9). This section is amended to define an uneconomic remnant of property as one with little or no utility to the owner which is left after the partial acquisition of his property for a Federal or federally assisted project and to direct the head of an agency administering a federally funded program to offer to acquire such an uneconomic remnant so that the owner or occupant would be eligible for the full benefits under the Uniform Act. This provision eliminates both ambiguities in the present Uniform Act and the resulting inequities that result, particularly where the character of a farm is changed by a partial acquisition.

Section 301(c). A new paragraph is added to Section 301: Section 301(10). Donations are authorized under this provision.

Section 302. This section is amended to include authority to a State to be exempt from the provisions of Title III if it enacts a statute that is certified by the Federal government to be similar in purpose and effect to the Federal Uniform Act. This provision is paralled to title II, section 207.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 401. Section 401. This section is added to establish that, with the exception of the lead agency provisions, the effective date of the Uniform Act is 24 months after the date of enactment or earlier under certain circumstances. The 24 month lead time on the other provisions of the Uniform Act is to allow sufficient time for the Federal agencies and the States to develop conforming laws and regulations.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendments to the Uniform Relocation Act of 1970 that Senator DURENBERGER is introducing today. The provisions of the bill are similar in purpose to legislation I myself first drafted in 1979.

Senator DURENBERGER is to be complimented for his work in shaping this measure and gaining unanimous support for it in both the House and Senate. In fact, the Senate has already passed substantially similar legislation twice. Today, he is reintroducing the same bill that was approved by the 98th Congress. It has already been approved twice by the Governmental Affairs Committee. I urge that my colleagues take immediate action on this measure so that passage will not be further delayed.

Too many people are being displaced by federally assisted programs without compensation. The original law, written in 1970, is now riddled with loopholes. As a result, the coverage is inadequate. This law governing relocation benefits has stayed the same while housing, highway, and other development programs it was meant to complement have changed substantially.

The Congress simply must give the Federal agencies the authority to aid the elderly people, the small farmers, the mom and pop store owners, and the families who are forced to move for the good of the total community. The Federal agencies have come to us time and time again over the past 6 years for changes in this law. Even a court decision urged that the Congress take action to make the Uniform Relocation Act more fair.

The bill Senator DURENBERGER and I introduce today will result in a standard set of Federal rules governing relocation. Currently, there are 13 separate Federal agencies that have promulgated 20 different sets of regulations. The result has been an administrative nightmare at the State and local levels of government.

An important and innovative provision of the bill permits the Federal agencies to certify State provisions for relocation when these follow the Federal model. This means that the rules will have adequate flexibility to meet local circumstances. The difference in the cost of living between urban and rural areas, for example, can be taken into account in setting benefit levels.

The effect will be to allow greater managerial discretion at the level of government where a project is administered. The opportunity is hereby provided for fairer, more equitable treatment for persons displaced by federally assisted programs.

I think it important to note that the Federal agencies will approve only those State laws that are the same in their purpose and effect as the Federal model. There is no abdication of the responsibilities of the Federal agencies or the Congress. Certification can be withdrawn at any time. And implementation by the States must be monitored by the Federal agencies.

The case for changes in this 15-year-old law has been made over and over again. There is broad consensus on this among State and local government officials, Federal agency personnel, tenants, organizations, and others affected by this Nation's relocation laws. In fact, I know of no opposition to this measure. Although both the House and Senate agreed on modifications to the law proposed in the 98th Congress, procedural difficulties prevented final passage.

Because of the great need, the widespread support, and the large amount of congressional work that has already gone into the language in S. 249, I urge quick action on this measure.

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 250. A bill to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 to provide price support for the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat, feed grains, and wool, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL PRICE SUPPORT ACT OF 1985

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to reauthorize several sections of the 1981 farm bill. This legislation will establish: First, commodity programs for wheat and feed grains; second, an effective and strengthened soil conservation program; and third, an active export promotion program, as well as several other provisions.

The legislation is designed to direct farm program benefits to family farmers, create an effective soil conservation program, and reduce the cost of farm programs to the taxpayer, while maintaining a safety net for family farmers.

In recent years, as the number of farms has declined, the lion's share of farm program benefits have gone to larger and larger farms. In 1982, the top 1 percent of American farms claimed 7 percent of direct farm program payments, and nearly $5 out of every $6 went to farmers larger than the national average. The original intent of farm programs was to assist family farmers. That intent must be repeated and reinforced in the 1985 legislation.

In order to direct benefits to family farmers, I am proposing a graduated target price system. For example, a corn farmer would receive a target price of $3.13 per bushel for the first 10,000 bushels he produces, $2.98 per bushel for the next 10,000 bushels, and $2.83 per bushel for production between 20,000 and 30,000 bushels. The amount of corn supported per farm would be limited to 30,000 bushels.

The limitations for each commodity was established so that the average family farm would have the majority of its production supported, but the large corporate farm would not. For example, the average corn farmer in the U.S. produces 11,216 bushels of corn. The 20,000 limitation would be equal to almost three times the average production. The average wheat farmer produces 5,736 bushels, and the 22,500 bushel limitation is nearly three times that amount. However, the average corporate farm of over 2,100 acres would have only a small portion of its production supported.

Since we are facing unprecedented Federal deficits, we can no longer afford to support large corporate farms. These large agribusinesses will remain in operation as long as they can make a profit. But the Government should not encourage or subsidize this expansion at the expense of family farmers, because these small farmers—the backbone of our agricultural system—are experiencing severe financial difficulties and will continue to need price support assistance. The program will not solve all farmers' problems, but it will assist many family farmers who would otherwise go under.

My legislation will also limit total direct farm program benefits to $20,000 and $200,000 on commodity loans. Again, these actions will help limit farm program benefits to family-size farmers.

A stronger soil conservation program is also included in my legislation. The basic provisions of the sodbuster bill, which the Senate passed on numerous occasions, and a farmland diversion program are the main proposals. The diversion program will offer incentives to farmers to seed farmland back to grass or establish shelterbelts. This program will: First, reduce soil erosion, and second, help control surplus production. The conversion of highly erodible land already under cultivation back to grass will help control erosion and reduce crop production. The same goal is also achieved with the establishment of shelterbelts. However, the shelterbelt program, in most cases, would be directed toward more productive farmland which needs to be more effectively protected from wind erosion. Without the implementation of a more effective soil conservation program, the future productivity of many areas in the United States may soon be endangered by excessive erosion. These provisions are a major effort to protect our topsoil.

The bill also addresses the need to aggressively market our farm products abroad and eliminate unfair trade practices used by other nations. The current administration is encouraged to enter into multilateral trade negotiations to resolve many longstanding agricultural trade issues and to use existing authority to combat export subsidies used by other nations. To more effectively market our products, an increased use of barter trade, negotiation of long-term commodity agreements with importing nations, continued export credit guarantee programs, and the Public Law-480 program are all essential.

If farmers are to prosper under a market-oriented farm program, we must effectively expand agricultural export markets. The action proposed in my legislation moves in that direction. Farmers, taxpayers, and consumers would all benefit from a market-oriented system if both domestic and export markets can be effectively expanded. To do this, free trade must be established domestically and internationally. This would allow farmers to compete on an equal basis. Unless farmers can have open access to all markets, a truly market-oriented farm program will not work.

This legislation proposal addresses three major sections of the farm bill. I believe the principles set forth in these sections are the basis for an effective family farm-oriented farm policy. I encourage my colleagues, and especially the Senate Agriculture Committee, to carefully review these proposals and give them full and careful consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in full.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOAN RATES AND TARGET PRICES FOR 1986 THROUGH 1990 WHEAT CROPS

SEC. 101. Effective only for the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat, section 1070 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1445b-2) is amended to read as follows:

SEC. 107c. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a)(1) The Secretary shall make available to producers, loans and purchases for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat at such level, not less than $3.30 per bushel, as the Secretary determines will maintain the competitive relationship of wheat to other grains in domestic and export markets after taking into consideration the cost of producing wheat, supply and demand conditions, and world prices for wheat: Provided, That if the Secretary determines that the average price of wheat received by producers in any marketing year is not more than 105 per centum of the level of loans and purchases for wheat for such marketing year, the Secretary may reduce the level of loans and purchases for wheat for the next marketing year by the amount the Secretary determines necessary to maintain domestic and export markets for grain, except that the level of loans and purchases shall not be reduced by more than 10 per centum in any year for below $3 per bushel.

"(2) The total amount of loans and purchases that shall be made available to a producer under paragraph (1) shall not exceed $200,000 for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat.

"(b)(1)(A)(i) In addition, the Secretary shall make available to producers payments for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat in an amount computed as provided in this subsection.

"(ii) Payments for any such crop of wheat shall be computed by multiplying—

"(I) the payment rate, by

"(II) the farm program acreage for the crop, by

"(III) the farm program payment yield for the crop.

"(iii) In no event may payments be made under this paragraph for any crop—

"(I) on a greater acreage than the acreage actually planted to wheat, or

"(II) or any quantity of wheat produced in excess of 22,500 bushels per producer.

"(B) The payment rate for wheat shall be the amount by which the higher or—

"(i) the national weighted average market price received by farmers during the first five months of the marketing year for such crop, as determined by the Secretary, or

"(ii) the loan level determined under subsection (a) of this section for such crop is less than the established price per bushel.

"(C)(i) The established price for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat, in the case of any producer, shall be not less than—

"(I) $4.48 per bushel for any quantity of wheat not in excess of 7,520 bushels,

"(II) $4.33 per bushel for any quantity of wheat in excess of 7,500 bushels, but not in excess of 15,000 bushels, and

"(III) $4.18 per bushel for any quantity of wheat in excess of 15,000 bushels, but not in excess of 22,500 bushels.

"(ii) Any such established price may be adjusted by the Secretary as the Secretary determines to be appropriate to reflect any change in—

"(I) The average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made from.

"(II) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year previous to the one for which the determination is made.

"(iii) The adjusted cost of production for each of such years may be determined by the Secretary on the basis of such information as the Secretary finds necessary and appropriate for the purpose and may include variable costs, machinery ownership costs, and general farm overhead costs, allocated to the crops involved on the basis of the proportion of the value of the total production derived from each crop.

"(D) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, if the Secretary adjusts the level of loans and purchases for wheat in accordance with the proviso in subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall provide emergency compensation by increasing the established price payments for wheat by such amount as the Secretary determines necessary to provide the same total return to producers as if the adjustment in the level of loans and purchases had not been made: Provided, That any payments under this subparagraph shall not be included in the payments subject to limitations under the provisions of section 501 of the Agricultural Price Support of 1985.

"(E) The total quantity on which payments would otherwise be payable to a producer on a farm for any crop under this paragraph shall be reduced by the quantity on which any disaster payment is made to the producer for the crop under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, if the Secretary determines that the producers on a farm are prevented from planting any portion of the acreage intended for wheat to wheat or other nonconserving crops because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the Secretary shall make a prevented planting disaster payment to the producers on the number of acres so affected but not to exceed the acreage planted to wheat for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to wheat or other nonconserving crop in lieu of wheat because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the immediately preceding year, multiplied by 75 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary times a payment rate equal to 33⅓ per centum of the established price for the crop.

"(B) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, if the Secretary determines that because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the total quantity of wheat which the producers are able to harvest on any farm is less than the result of multiplying 60 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the acreage planted for harvest for such crop, the Secretary shall make a reduced yield disaster payment to the producers at a rate equal to 50 per centum of the established price for the crop for the deficiency in production below 60 per centum for the crop.

"(C) Producers on a farm shall not be eligible for disaster payments under this paragraph if crop insurance is available to them under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.) with respect to their wheat acreage.

"(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, the Secretary may make disaster payments to producers on a farm under this paragraph whenever the Secretary determines that—

"(i) as the result of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, producers on a farm have suffered substantial losses of production either from being prevented from planting wheat or other nonconserving crop or from reduced yields, and that such losses have created an economic emergency for the producers;

"(ii) Federal crop insurance indemnity payments and other forms of assistance made available by the Federal Government to such producers for such losses are insufficient to alleviate such economic emergency, or no crop insurance covered the loss because of transitional problems attendant to the Federal crop insurance program;

"(iii) additional assistance must be made available to such producers to alleviate the economic emergency. The Secretary may make such adjustments in the amount of payments made available under this subparagraph with respect to individual farms so as to assure the equitable allotment of such payments among producers taking into account other forms of Federal disaster assistance provided to the producers for the crop involved.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall proclaim a national program acreage for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of wheat. The proclamation shall be made not later than July 1 of each calendar year for the crop harvested in the next succeeding calendar year, except that in the case of the 1986 crop, the proclamation shall be made as soon as practicable after enactment of the Agricultural Price Support Act of 1985. The Secretary may revise the national program acreage first proclaimed for any crop year for the purpose of determining the allocation factor under paragraph (2) of this subsection if the Secretary determines it necessary based upon the latest information, and the Secretary shall proclaim such revised national program acreage as soon as it is made. The national program acreage for wheat shall be the number of harvested acres the Secretary determines (on the basis of the weighted national average of the farm program payment yields for the crop for which the determination is made) will produce the quantity (less imports) that the Secretary estimates will be utilized domestically and for export during the marketing year for such crop. If the Secretary determines that carryover stocks of wheat are excessive or an increase in stocks is needed to assure desirable carryover, the Secretary may adjust the national program acreage by the amount the Secretary determines will accomplish the desired increase or decrease in carryover stocks.

"(2) The Secretary shall determine a program allocation factor for each crop of wheat. The allocation factor for wheat shall be determined by dividing the national program acreage for the crop by the number of acres that the Secretary estimates will be harvested for such crop, except that in no event shall the allocation factor for any crop of wheat be more than 100 per centum nor less than 80 per centum.

"(3) The individual farm program acreage for each crop of wheat shall be determined by multiplying the allocation factor by the acreage of wheat planted for harvest on the farms for which individual farm program acreages are required to be determined. The farm program acreage shall not be further reduced by application of the allocation factor if the producers reduce the acreage of wheat planted for harvest on the farm from the acreage base established for the farm under subsection (e)(2) of this section by at least the percentage recommended by the Secretary in the proclamation of the national program acreage. The Secretary shall provide fair and equitable treatment for producers on farms on which the acreage of wheat planted for harvest is less than the acreage base established for the farm under subsection (e)(2), but for which the reduction is insufficient to exempt the farm from the application of the allocation factor. In establishing the allocation factor for wheat, the Secretary may make such adjustment as the Secretary deems necessary to take into account the extent of exemption of farms under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph.

"(d) The farm program payment yield for each crop of wheat shall be the yield established for the farm for the previous crop year, adjusted by the Secretary to provide a fair and equitable yield. If no payment yield for wheat was established for the farm in the previous crop year, the Secretary may determine such yield as the Secretary finds fair and reasonable. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the determination of yields, the Secretary shall take into account the actual yields proved by the producer, and neither such yields nor the farm program payment yield established on the basis of such yields shall be reduced under other provisions of this subsection. If the Secretary determines it necessary, the Secretary may establish national, State, or county program payment yields on the basis of historical yields, as adjusted by the Secretary to correct for abnormal factors affecting such yields in the historical period, or, if such data are not available, on the Secretary's estimate of actual yields for the crop year involved. In national, State, or county program payment yields are established, the farm program payment yields shall balance to the national, State, or county program payment yields.

"(e) (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary may provide for any crop either for a program under which the acreage planted to wheat would be limited as described in paragraph (2) or a set-aside program as described in paragraph (3) of this subsection if the Secretary determines that the total supply of wheat, in the absence of such a program, will be excessive, taking into account the need for an adequate carryover to maintain reasonable and stable supplies and prices and to meet a national emergency.

"(2) If a wheat acreage limitation program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection, such limitation shall be achieved by applying a uniform percentage reduction to the acreage base for each wheat-producing farm, producers who knowingly produce wheat in excess of the permitted wheat acreage for the farm shall be ineligible for wheat loans, purchasers, and payments with respect to that farm. The acreage base for any farm for the purpose of determining any reduction required to be made for any year as the result of a limitation under this paragraph shall be the acreage planted on the farm to wheat for harvest in the crop year immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made or, at the discretion of the Secretary, the average acreage planted to wheat for harvest in the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made. For the purpose of the preceding sentence, acreage planted to wheat for harvest shall include any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to wheat or other nonconserving crop in lieu of wheat because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers. The Secretary may make adjustments to reflect established crop-rotation practices and to reflect such other factors as the Secretary determines should be considered in determining a fair and equitable base. A number of acres on the farm determined by dividing (A) the product obtained by multiplying the number of acres required to be withdrawn from the production of wheat times the number of acres actually planted to such commodity, by (B) the number of acres authorized to be planted to such commodity under the limitation established by the Secretary shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary. The number of acres so determined is hereafter in this subsection referred to as 'reduced acreage'. If an acreage limitation program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection for a crop of wheat, subsection (c) of this section shall not be applicable to such crop, including any prior announcement which may have been made under such subsection with respect to such crop. The individual farm program acreage shall be the acreage planted on the farm to wheat for harvest within the permitted wheat acreage for the farm as established under this paragraph.

"(3) If a set-aside program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection, then as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, and payments authorized by this section, the producers on a farm must set aside and devote to conservation uses an acreage of cropland equal to a specified percentage, as determined by the Secretary, of the acreage of wheat planted for harvest for the crop for which the set-aside is in effect. The set-aside acreage shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary. If a set-aside program is established, the Secretary may limit the acreage planted to wheat. Such limitation shall be applied on a uniform basis to all wheat-producing farms. The Secretary may make such adjustments in individual set-aside acreages under this section as the Secretary determines necessary to correct for abnormal factors affecting production, and to give due consideration to tillable acreage, crop-rotation practices, types of soil, soil and water conservation measures, topography, and such other factors as the Secretary deems necessary.

"(4) The regulations issued by the Secretary under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection with respect to acreage required to be devoted to conservation uses shall assure protection of such acreage from weeds and wind and water erosion. The Secretary may permit, subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe, all or any part of such acreage to be devoted to sweet sorghum, hay and grazing or the production of guar, sesame, safflower, sunflower, castor beans, mustard seed, crambe, plantago ovato, flaxseed, triticale, rye, or other commodity, if the Secretary determines that such production is needed to provide an adequate supply of such commodities, is not likely to increase the cost of the price support program, and will not affect farm income adversely. In determining the amount of land to be devoted to conservation uses under an acreage limitation or set-aside program with respect to land that has been farmed under summer fallow practices, as defined by the Secretary, the Secretary shall consider the effects of soil erosion and such other factors as the Secretary considers appropriate.

"(5) The Secretary may make land diversion payments to producers of wheat, whether or not an acreage limitation or set-aside program for wheat is in effect, if the Secretary determines that such land diversion payments are necessary to assist in adjusting the total national acreage of wheat to desirable goals. Such land diversion payments shall be made to producers who, to the extent prescribed by the Secretary, devote to approved conservation uses an acreage of cropland on the farm in accordance with land diversion contracts entered into by the Secretary with such producers. The amounts payable to producers under land diversion contracts may be determined through the submission of bids for such contracts by producers in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe or through such other means as the Secretary determines appropriate. In determining the acceptability of contract offers, the Secretary shall take into consideration the extent of the diversion to be undertaken by the producers and the productivity of the acreage diverted. The Secretary shall limit the total acreage to be diverted under agreements in any county or local community so as not to affect adversely the economy of the county or local community.

"(6) Any reduced acreage, set-aside acreage, and additional diverted acreage may be devoted to wildlife food plots or wildlife habitat in conformity with standards established by the Secretary in consultation with wildlife agencies. The Secretary may pay an appropriate share of the cost of practices designed to carry out the purposes of the foregoing sentence. The Secretary may provide for an additional payment on such acreage in an amount determined by the Secretary to be appropriate in relation to the benefit to the general public if the producer agrees to permit, without other compensation, access to all or such portion of the farm, as the Secretary may prescribe, by the general public, for hunting, trapping, fishing, and hiking, subject to applicable State and Federal regulations.

"(7) An operator of a farm desiring to participate in the program conducted under this subsection shall execute an agrement with the Secretary providing for such participation not later than such date as the Secretary may prescribe. The Secretary may, by mutual agreement with the producers on the farm, terminate or modify any such agreement if the Secretary determines such action necessary because of an emergency created by drought or other disaster or to prevent or alleviate a shortage in the supply of agricultural commodities.

"(f) If the failure of a producer to comply fully with the terms and conditions of the program conducted under this section precludes the making of loans, purchases, and payments, the Secretary may, nevertheless, make such loans, purchases, and payments in such amounts as the Secretary determines to be equitable in relation to the seriousness of the failure. The Secretary may authorize the county and State committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b)) to waive or modify deadlines and other program requirements in cases in which lateness or failure to meet such other requirements does not affect adversely the operation of the progam.

"(g) The Secretary may issue such regulations as the Secretary determines necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(h) The Secretary shall carry out the program authorized by this section through the Commodity Credit Corportion.

"(i) The provisions of section 8(g) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(g)) (relating to assignment of payments) shall apply to payments under this section.

"(j) The Secretary shall provide for the sharing of payments made under this section for any farm among the producers on the farm on a fair and equitable basis.

"(k) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, compliance on a farm with the terms and conditions of any other commodity program may not be required as a condition of eligibility for loans, purhases, or payments under this section if an acreage limitation program is established under subsection (e)(2) of this section, but may be required if a set-aside program is established under subsection (e)(3) of this section.".

TITLE II—FEED GRAINS

LOAN RATES AND TARGET PRICES FOR 1986 THROUGH 1990 FEED GRAIN CROPS

SEC. 201. Effective only for the 1986 through 1990 crops of feed grains, the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended by adding after section 105B (7 U.S.C. 1444d) a new section as follows:

"SEC. 105C. Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

"(a)(1) The Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of corn at such level, not less than $2.55 per bushel, as the Secretary determines will encourage the exportation of feed grains and not result in excessive total stocks of feed grains after taking into consideration the cost of producing corn, supply and demand conditions, and world prices for corn: Provided, That if the Secretary determines that the average price of corn received by producers in any marketing year is not more than 105 per centum of the level of loans and purchases for corn for such marketing year, the Secretary may reduce the level of loans and purchases for corn for the next marketing year by the amount the Secretary determines necessary to maintain domestic and export markets for grain, except that the level of loans and purchases shall not be reduced by more than 10 per centum in any year nor below $2 per bushel.

"(2) The Secretary shall make available to producers loans and purchases for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of grain sorghums, barley, oats, and rye, respectively, at such level as the Secretary determines is fair and reasonable in relation to the level that loans and purchases are made available for corn, taking into consideration the feeding value of such commodity in relation to corn and other factors specified in section 401(b) of this Act.

"(3) The total amount of loans and purchases that shall be made available to a producer under paragraph (1) or (2) shall not exceed $200,000 for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of a commodity.

"(b)(1)(A)(i) The Secretary shall make available to producers payments for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of corn, grain sorghums, oats, and barley, in an amount computed as provided in this subsection.

"(ii) payments for any such crop of feed grains shall be computed by multiplying—

"(I) the payment rate, by

"(II) the farm program acreage for the crop, by

"(III) the farm program payment yield for the crop.

"(iii) In no event may payments be made under this paragraph for any crop—

"(I) on a greater acreage than the acreage actually planted to such feed grains.

"(II on any quantity of corn produced in excess of 30,000 bushels per producer,

"(III) on any quantity of barley produced in excess of 15,000 bushels per producer, or

"(IV) on any quantity of oats produced in excess of 9,000 bushels per producer.

"(B) The payment rate for corn, barley, and oats shall be the amount by which the higher of—

"(i) the national weighted average market price received by farmers during the first five months of the marketing year for such crop, as determined by the Secretary, or

"(ii) the loan level determined under subsection (a) of this section for such crop is less than the established price per bushel.

"(C)(i) The established price for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of corn, in the case of any producer, shall be not less than—

"(I) $3.13 per bushel for any quantity of corn not in excess of 10,000 bushels,

"(II) $2.98 per bushel for any quantity of corn in excess of 10,000 bushels, but not in excess of 20,000 bushels, and

"(III) $2.83 per bushel for any quantity of corn in excess of 20,000 bushels, but not in excess of 22,500 bushels.

"(ii) The established price for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of barley, in the case of any producer, shall be not less than—

"(I) $2.70 per bushel for any quantity of barley not in excess of 5,000 bushels,

"(II) $2.55 per bushel for any quantity of barley in excess of 5,000 bushels, but not in excess of 10,000 bushels, and

"(III) $2.40 per bushel for any quantity of barley in excess of 10,000 bushels, but not in excess of 15,000 bushels.

"(iii) The established price for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of oats, in the case of any producer, shall be not less than—

"(I) $1.70 per bushel for any quantity of oats not in excess of 3,000 bushels.

"(II) $1.55 per bushel for any quantity of oats in excess of 3.000 bushels, but not in excess of 6.000 bushels, and.

"(III) $1.40 per bushel for any quantity of oats in excess of 6,000 bushels, but not in excess of 9,000 bushels.

"(iv) Any established price prescribed under clause (i), (ii), or (iii) may be adjusted by the Secretary as the Secretary determines to be appropriate to reflect any change in—

"(I) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year for when the determination is made from

"(II) the average adjusted cost of production per acre for the two crop years immediately preceding the year previous to the one for which the determination is made.

"(v) The adjusted cost of production for each of such years may be determined by the Secretary on the basis of such information as the Secretary finds necessary and appropriate for the purpose and may include variable costs, machinery ownership costs, and general farm overhead costs, allocated to the crops involved on the basis of the proportion of the value of the total production derived from each crop.

"(D) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, if the Secretary adjusts the level of loans and purchases for corn in accordance with the proviso in subsection (a)(1) of this section, the Secretary shall provide emergency compensation by increasing the established price payments for corn by such amount as the Secretary determines necessary to provide the same total return to producers as if the adjustment in the level of loans and purchases had not been made: Provided, That any such payments under this subparagraph shall not be included in the payments subject to limitation under the provisions of section 501 of the Agricultural Price Subport Act of 1985.

"(E) The payment rate for grain sorghums shall be such rate as the Secretary determines fair and reasonable in relation to the rate at which payments are made available for corn.

"(F) The total quantity on which payments would otherwise be payable to a producer on a farm for any crop under this paragraph shall be reduced by the quantity on which any disaster payment is made to the producer for the crop under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, if the Secretary determines that the producers on a farm are prevented from planting any portion of the acreage intended for feed grains to feed grains or other nonconserving crops because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the Secretary shall make a prevented planting disaster payment to the producers on the number of acres so affected but not to exceed the acreage planted to feed grains for harvest (including any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to feed grains or other nonconserving crop in lieu of feed grains because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers) in the immediately preceding year, multiplied by 75 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary times a payment rate equal to 33⅓ per centum of the established price for the crop.

"(B) Except as provided in subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, if the Secretary determines that because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, the total quantity of feed grains which the producers are able to harvest on any farm is less than the result of multiplying 60 per centum of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the acreage planted for harvest for such crop, the Secretary shall make a reduced yield disaster payment to the producers at a rate equal to 50 per centum of the established price for the crop for the deficiency in production below 50 per centum for the crop.

"(C) Producers on a farm shall not be eligible for disaster payments under this paragraph if crop insurance is available to them under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.) with respect to their feed grain acreage.

"(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph, the Secretary may make disaster payments to producers on a farm under this paragraph whenever the Secretary determines that—

"(i) as the result of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers, producers on a farm have suffered substantial losses of production either from being prevented from planting feed grains or other nonconserving crop or from reduced yield and that such losses have created an economic emergency for the producers;

"(ii) Federal crop insurance indemnity payments and other forms of assistance made available by the Federal Government to such producers for such losses are insufficient to alleviate such economic emergency, or no crop insurance covered the loss because of transitional problems attendant to the Federal crop insurance program; and

"(iii) additional assistance must be made available to such producers to alleviate the economic emergency.

The Secretary may make such adjustments in the amount of payments made available under this subparagraph with respect to individual farms so as to assure the equitable allotment of such payments among producers taking into account other forms of Federal disaster assistance provided to the producers for the crop involved.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall proclaim a national program acreage for each of the 1986 through 1990 crops of feed grains. The proclamation shall be made not later than November 15 of each calendar year for the crop harvested in the next succeeding calendar year, except that in the case of the 1986 crop, the proclamation shall be made as soon as practicable after enactment of the Agricultural Price Support Act of 1985. The Secretary may revise the national program acreage first proclaimed for any crop year for the purpose of determining the allocation factor under paragraph (2) of this subsection if the Secretary determines it necessary based upon the latest information, and the Secretary shall proclaim such revised national program acreage as soon as it is made. The national program acreage for feed grains shall be the number of harvested acres the Secretary determines (on the basis of the weighted national average of the farm program payment yields for the crop for which the determination is made) will produce the quantity (less imports) that the Secretary estimates will be utilized domestically and for export during the marketing year for such crop. If the Secretary determines that carryover stocks of feed grains are excessive or an increase in stocks is needed to assure desirable carryover, the Secretary may adjust the national program acreage by the amount the Secretary determines will accomplish the desired increase or decrease in carryover stocks.

"(2) The Secretary shall determine a program allocation factor for each crop of feed grains. The allocation factor for feed grains shall be determined by dividing the national program acreage for the crop by the number of acres that the Secretary estimates will be harvested for such crop, except that in no event shall the allocation factor for any crop of feed grains be more than 100 per centum nor less than 80 per centum.

"(3) The individual farm program acreage for each crop of feed grains shall be determined by multiplying the allocation factor by the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest on the farms for which individual farm program acreages are required to be determined. The farm program acreage shall not be further reduced by application of the allocation factor if the producers reduce the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest on the farm from the acreage base established for the farm under subsection (e)(2) of this section by at least the percentage recommended by the Secretary in the proclamation of the national program acreage. The Secretary shall provide fair and equitable treatment for producers on farms on which the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest is less than the acreage base established for the farm under subsection (e)(2), but for which the reduction is insufficient to exempt the farm from the application of the allocation factor. In establishing the allocation factor for feed grains, the Secretary may make such adjustment as the Secretary deems necessary to take into account the extent of exemption of farms under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph.

"(d) The farm program payment yield for each crop of feed grains shall be the yield established for the farm for the previous crop year, adjusted by the Secretary to provide a fair and equitable yield. If no payment yield for feed grains was established for the farm in the previous crop year, the Secretary may determine such yield as the Secretary finds fair and reasonable. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, in the determination of yields, the Secretary shall take into account the actual yields proved by the producer, and neither such yields nor the farm program payment yield established on the basis of such yields shall be reduced under other provisions of this subsection. If the Secretary determines it necessary, the Secretary may establish national, State, or county program payment yields on the basis of historical yields, as adjusted by the Secretary to correct for abnormal factors affecting such yields in the historical period, or, if such data are not available, on the Secretary's estimate of actual yields for the crop year involved. If national, State, or county program payment yields are established, the farm program payment yields shall balance to the national, State or county program payment yields.

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary may provide for any crop either for a program under which the acreage planted to feed grains would be limited as described in paragraph (2) or a set-aside program as described in paragraph (3) of this subsection if the Secretary determines that the total supply of feed grains, in the absence of such a program, will be excessive, taking into account the need for an adequate carryover to maintain reasonable and stable supplies and prices and to meet a national emergency. The Secretary shall announce any such feed grain acreage limitation program or set-aside program not later than November 15 prior to the calendar year in which the crop is harvested, except that in the case of the 1986 crop, the Secretary shall announce such program as soon as practicable after enactment of the Agricultural Price Support Act of 1985.

"(2) If a feed grain acreage limitation program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection, such limitation shall be achieved by applying a uniform percentage reduction to the acreage base for each feed grain-producing farm. Producers who knowingly produce feed grains in excess of the permitted feed grain acreage for the farm shall be ineligible for feed grain loans, purchases, and payments with respect to that farm. The Secretary may provide that no producer of malting barley shall be required as a condition of eligibility for feed grain loans, purchases, and payments to comply with any acreage limitation under this paragraph if such producer has previously produced a malting variety of barley, plants barley only of an acceptable malting variety for harvest, and meets such other conditions as the Secretary may prescribe. The acreage base for any farm for the purpose of determining any reduction required to be made for any year as the result of a limitation under this paragraph shall be the acreage planted on the farm to feed grains for harvest in the crop year immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made or, at the discretion of the Secretary, the average acreage planted to feed grains for harvest in the two crop years immediately preceding the year for which the determination is made. For the purpose of the preceding sentence, acreage planted to feed grains for harvest shall include any acreage which the producers were prevented from planting to feed grains or other nonconserving crop in lieu of feed grains because of drought, flood, or other natural disaster, or other condition beyond the control of the producers. The Secretary may make adjustments to reflect established crop-rotation practices and to reflect such other factors as the Secretary determines should be considered in determining a fair and equitable base. A number of acres on the farm determined by dividing (A) the product obtained by multiplying the number of acres required to be withdrawn from the production of feed grains times the number of acres actually planted to such commodity, by (B) the number of acres authorized to be planted to such commodity under the limitation established by the Secretary shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary. The number of acres so determined is hereafter in this subsection referred to as 'reduced acreage'. If an acreage limitation program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection for a crop of feed grains, subsection (c) of this section shall not be applicable to such crop, including any prior announcement which may have been made under such subsection with respect to such crop. The individual farm program acreage shall be the acreage planted on the farm to feed grains for harvest within the permitted feed grain acreage for the farm as established under this paragraph.

"(3) If a set-aside program is announced under paragraph (1) of this subsection, then as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, and payments authorized by this section, the producers on a farm must set aside and devote to conservation uses an acreage of cropland equal to a specified percentage, as determined by the Secretary, of the acreage of feed grains planted for harvest for the crop for which the set-aside is in effect. The set-aside acreage shall be devoted to conservation uses, in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary. If a set-aside program is established, the Secretary may limit the acreage planted to feed grains. Such limitation shall be applied on a uniform basis to all feed grain-producing farms. The Secretary may make such adjustments in individual set-aside acreages under this section as the Secretary determines necessary to correct for abnormal factors affecting production, and to give due consideration to tillable acreage, crop-rotation practices, types of soil, soil and water conservation measures, topography, and such other factors as the Secretary deems necessary.

"(4) The regulations issued by the Secretary under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection with respect to acreage required to be devoted to conservation uses shall assure protection of such acreage from weeds and wind and water erosion. The Secretary may permit, subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe, all or any part of such acreage to be devoted to sweet sorghum, hay and grazing or the production of guar, sesame, safflower, sunflower, castor beans, mustard seed, crambe, plantago ovato, flaxseed, triticale, rye, or other commodity, if the Secretary determines that such production is needed to provide an adequate supply of such commodities, is not likely to increase the cost of the price support program, and will not affect farm income adversely.

"(5) The Secretary may make land diversion payments to producers of feed grains, whether or not an acreage limitation or set-aside program for feed grains is in effect, if the Secretary determines that such land diversion payments are necessary to assist in adjusting the total national acreage of feed grains to desirable goals. Such land diversion payments shall be made to producers who, to the extent prescribed by the Secretary, devote to approved conservation uses an acreage of cropland on the farm in accordance with land diversion contracts entered into by the Secretary with such producers. The amounts payable to producers under land diversion contracts may be determined through the submission of bids for such contracts by producers in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe or such other means as the Secretary determines appropriate. In determining the acceptability of contract offers, the Secretary shall take into consideration the extent of the diversion to be undertaken by the producers and the productivity of the acreage diverted. The Secretary shall limit the total acreage to be diverted under agreements in any county or local community so as not to affect adversely the economy of the county or local community.

"(6) Any reduced acerage, set-aside acreage, and additional diverted acreage may be devoted to wildlife food plots or wildlife habitat in conformity with standards established by the Secretary in consultation with wildlife agencies. The Secretary may pay an appropriate share of the cost of practices designed to carry out the purposes of the foregoing sentence. The Secretary may provide for an additional payment on such acreage in an amount determined by the Secretary to be appropriate in relation to the benefit to the general public if the producer agrees to permit, without other compensation, access to all or such portion of the farm, as the Secretary may prescribe, by the general public, for hunting, trapping, fishing, and hiking, subject to applicable State and Federal regulations.

"(7) An operator of a farm desiring to participate in the program conducted under this subsection shall execute an agreement with the Secretary providing for such participation not later than such date as the Secretary may prescribe. The Secretary may, by mutual agreement with the producers on the farm, terminate or modify any such agreement if the Secretary determines such action necessary because of an emergency created by drought or other disaster or to prevent or alleviate a shortage in the supply of agricultural commodities.

"(f) If the failure of a producer to comply fully with the terms and conditions of the program conducted under this section precludes the making of loans, purchases, and payments, the Secretary may, nevertheless, make such loans, purchases, and payments in such amounts as the Secretary determines to be equitable in relation to the seriousness of the failure. The Secretary may authorize the county and State committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590b(b)) to waive or modify deadlines and other program requirements in cases in which lateness or failure to meet such other requirements does not affect adversely the operation of the program.

"(g) The Secretary may issue such regulations as the Secretary determines necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(h) The Secretary shall carry out the program authorized by this section through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

"(i) The provisions of section 8(c) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(g)) (relating to assignment of payments) shall apply to payments under this section.

"(j) The Secretary shall provide for the sharing of payments made under this section for any farm among the producers on the farm on a fair and equitable basis.

"(k) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, compliance on a farm with the terms and conditions of any other commodity program may not be required as a condition of eligibility for loans, purchases, or payments under this section if an acreage limitation program is established under subsection (e)(2) of this section, but may be required if a set-aside program is established under subsection (e)(3) of this section.".

NONAPPLICABILITY OF SECTION 105 OF THE AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949 TO THE 1986 THROUGH 1990 CROPS OF FEED GRAINS

SEC. 202. Section 105 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1444b) shall not be applicable to the 1986 through 1990 crops of feed grains.

TITLE III—SOIL CONSERVATION

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 301. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "agricultural commodity" means any agricultural product planted and produced by annual tilling of the soil, including one-trip planters;

(2) the term "highly erodible land" means land classified by the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture as class IVe, VIe, or VII land under the land capability classification systems in effect on the date of enactment of this Act. The land capability class for a field shall be that determined by the Secretary to be the predominant class under regulations issued by the Secretary;

(3) the term "county committee" means a county committee established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b));

(4) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture;

(5) the term "State" means each of the several States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and

(6) the term "State committee" means a State committee established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b)).

PROGRAM INELIGIBILITY

SEC. 302. Except as provided in section 4 and notwithstanding any other provision of law, following the date of enactment of this Act any person who produces an agricultural commodity on highly erodable land shall be ineligible, with respect to such commodity produced on such land, for—

(1) any type of price support, income assistance, or production adjustment payments for such commodity made available under the Agricultural Act of 1949, the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act, or any other Act;

(2) a loan for the construction or purchase of a facility for the storage of such commodity made under section 4(h) of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act;

(3) crop insurance for such commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act;

(4) a disaster payment for such commodity made under the Agricultural Act of 1949; or

(5) a new loan made, insured, or guaranteed under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act, or any other provision of law administered by the Farmers Home Administration, if the Secretary determines that such loan will be used for a purpose that will contribute to excessive erosion of highly erodible land.

EXCEPTIONS

SEC. 303. Section 302 shall not apply to—

(1) any land that was cultivated by a person to produce any of the 1973 through 1983 crops of agricultural commodities;

(2) any crop of an agricultural commodity planted by a person before the date of enactment of this Act;

(3) any crop of an agricultural commodity planted by a person during any crop year beginning before the date of enactment of this Act;

(4) any loan described in section 302 made before the date of enactment of this Act; or

(5) any crop of an agricultural commodity produced using a conservation system that has been approved by a soil conservation district and that is based on technical standards set forth in the Soil Conservation Service technical guide for that soil conservation district. In areas where no soil conservation district exists, the Secretary shall determine the adequacy of the conservation system to be used in the production of any agricultural commodity on highly erodible land.

USE OF AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION AND CONSERVATION COUNTY COMMITTEES IN ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 304. To ensure compliance with the provisions of this Act on the part of those persons participating in the programs described in section 302, as well as fair and equitable treatment in the application of this Act, the Secretary shall use the county committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act in the administration of this Act.

APPEAL OF LAND CLASSIFICATION

SEC. 305. The Secretary shall establish, by regulation, an appeal procedure under which a person who produces an agricultural commodity on land classified as class IVe, VIe, VII, or VIII land under the land capability classification systems applicable under this Act may seek review of such classification.

COMPLETION OF SOIL SURVEYS

SEC. 306. The Secretary shall, as soon as practicable, complete soil surveys on those private lands that do not have a soil survey suitable for use in determining the land capability class for purposes of this Act, and, insofar as possible, concentrate on those localities where significant amounts of highly erodible land are being converted to the production of agricultural commodities.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM

SEC. 307. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture may enter into contracts for periods of not less than five years with producers determined by the Secretary to have control for the contract period of the farms covered by the contract.

(b) Under the terms of such contract, the producer must agree—

(1) to establish and maintain for the contract period protective vegetative cover (including but not limited to grass and trees), water storage facilities, or other soils-, water-, wildlife-, or forest-conserving uses on a specifically designated acreage of land on the farm regularly used in the production of crops (including crops, such as tame hay, alfalfa, and clovers, which do not require annual tillage);

(2) to devote to conserving crops or uses, or allow to remain idle, throughout the contract period an acreage of the remaining land on the farm which is not less than the acreage normally devoted only to conserving crops or uses or normally allowed to remain idle on such remaining acreage;

(3) not to harvest any crop from the acreage established in protective vegetative cover, except that the producer may—

(A) harvest timber (in accordance with sound forestry management) and wildlife or other natural products of such acreage which do not increase supplies of feed for domestic animals; and in order to alleviate damage, hardship, or suffering caused by severe drought, flood, or other natural disaster.

(B) remove hay from such acreage if the Secretary, after certification by the Governor of the State in which such acreage is situated of the need for removal of hay from such acreage, determines that it is necessary to permit removal of hay from such acreage

(4)(A) not to graze any acreage established in protective vegetative cover prior to the date of the enactment of this Act or such later date as may be provided in the contract; and

(B) if such acreage is grazed at the end of such period, to graze such acreage during the remainder of the period covered by the contract in accordance with sound pasture management;

(5) not to adopt any practice, or divert lands on the farm from conservation, woods, grazing, or other use, to any use specified by the Secretary in the contract as a practice or use which would tend to defeat the purposes of the contract;

(6)(A) in any case in which the Secretary determines that there has been a violation of the contract (including the prohibition of grazing on conservation acreages) at any stage during the time such producer has control of the farm and that such violation is of such a substantial nature as to warrant termination of the contract, to forfeit all rights to payments or grants under the contract and to refund to the United States all payments and grants received by the producer under the contract; and

(B) in any case in which the Secretary determines that there has been a violation of the contract but that such violation is of such a nature as not to warrant termination of the contract, to accept such payment adjustments, forfeit such benefits, and make such refunds to the United States of payments and benefits received by the producer under the contract as the Secretary determines to be appropriate; and

(7) to such additional provisions as the Secretary determines are desirable and includes in the contract to effectuate the purposes of this Act and to facilitate the practical administration of the conservation reserve program, including provisions relating to control of noxious weeds.

(c) In return for such agreement by the producer, the Secretary shall agree—

(1) to bear such part of the cost (including labor) of establishing and maintaining vegetative cover, water storage facilities, or other soil-, water-, wildlife-, or forest-conserving uses, on the designated acreage as the Secretary determines to be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Act, but not to exceed a maximum amount per acre or facility prescribed by the Secretary for the county or area in which the farm is situated; and

(2) to make an annual payment to the producer for the term of the contract (in an amount determined by the Secretary) upon determination that the producer has fulfilled the provisions of the contract entitling the producer to such payment.

(d)(1) The Secretary shall determine the amount of annual payments under subsection (c)(2) on such basis as the Secretary determines will provide producers with a fair and reasonable annual return on the land established in protective vegetative cover or water storage facilities, or other soil-, water-,wildlife-, or forest-conserving uses, taking into consideration—

(A) the value of the land for the production of commodities customarily grown on such kind of land in the county or area;

(B) the prevailing rates for cash rentals for similar land in the county or area;

(C) the incentive necessary to obtain contracts covering sufficient acreage for the substantial accomplishment of the purposes of the conservation reserve program; and

(D) such other factors as the Secretary considers appropriate.

(2) The Secretary may establish such amount of annual payments on an individual farm basis, a county or area basis, or such other basis as the Secretary determines will facilitate the practical administration of the program.

(e) In determining the lands in any area which are eligible for coverage under contracts entered into under this section, the Secretary may use an advertising and bid procedure if the Secretary determines that such action will contribute to the effective and equitable administration of the conservation reserve program.

(f)(1) A contract may not be terminated under subsection (b)(6) unless the nature of the violation of the contract is such as to defeat or substantially impair the purposes of the contract.

(2) If a State committee believes that there has been a violation of a contract which would warrant termination of the contract, the State committee shall give the producer written notice of the violation by registered mail, certified mail, or personal service.

(3) If the producer requests an opportunity to show cause why the contract should not be terminated within thirty days after the delivery or service of such notice, the producer shall be given an opportunity to show cause, in an informal proceeding before the county committee under regulations promulgated by the Secretary, why the contract should not be terminated.

(4) If the producer does not request an opportunity to show cause why the contract should not be terminated within such thirty day period, the determination of the State committee shall be final and conclusive if made in accordance with regulations of the Secretary.

(5) If the producer within such thirty day period, requests an opportunity to show cause why the contract should not be terminated, the county committee, at the conclusion of the proceeding, shall submit a report on the violation of the contract to the State committee, including the recommendations of the county committee.

(6) If the State committee receives such a request, the State committee shall make a determination, on the basis of such report and such other information as is available to the State committee, as to whether there has been a violation which would warrant termination of the contract.

(7) The producer shall be accorded the right, in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary, to appear before the State committee in connection with the determination of the State committee on the issue.

(8) The producer shall be given written notice by registered or certified mail or personal service of the determination of the State committee.

(9) If the producer feels aggrieved by such determination, the producer may obtain judicial review of such determination by filing a complaint with the United States district court for the district in which the land covered by the contract is located, within ninety days after the delivery or service of notice of such determination, requesting the court to set aside such determination.

(10) The copy of the summons and complaint required to be delivered to the officer or agency whose order is being attacked shall be sent to the chairman of the State committee.

(11) The action in the United States district court shall be a trial de novo to determine whether there has been a violation which would warrant termination of the contract.

(12) If the producer does not seek judicial review of the determination of the State committee within the ninety-day period allowed for filing a complaint, the determination of the State committee shall be final and conclusive.

CERTIFICATE OF CLAIMANT

SEC. 308. Payment or compensation authorized by this Act may be made upon the certification by the claimant, in such form as the Secretary may prescribe, that the claimant has complied with all requirements for such payment and that the statements and information contained in the application for payment are correct and true to the best of the knowledge and belief of the claimant.

FINALITY OF DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 309. (a) Except as provided in section 3(f), if payment or compensation is made or provided under this Act in accordance with this Act and applicable regulations, such action shall be final and conclusive and shall not be reviewable by any other officer or agency of the Government.

(b) If a producer who is entitled to any such payment or compensation dies, becomes incompetent, or disappears before receiving such payment or compensation, or is succeeded by another who renders or completes the required performance, the Secretary shall make or provide such payment or compensation, in accordance with regulations and without regard to any other provisions of law, in such manner as the Secretary determines to be fair and reasonable in light of all of the circumstances.

TERMINATION AND MODIFICATION OF CONTRACTS

SEC. 310. (a) The Secretary may terminate any contract entered into under this Act with a producer by mutual agreement with the producer if the Secretary determines that such termination would be in the public interest.

(b) The Secretary may agree to such modification of any contract entered into under this Act as the Secretary determines to be desirable to carry out the purposes of this Act and to facilitate the practicable administration of the conservation reserve program.

POOLING OF CONSERVATION RESERVE LAND

SEC. 311. If the Secretary determines that the management of family farms or optimum land use will be aided, the Secretary may permit farmers to pool their rights to participate jointly in the conservation reserve program on property other than the farm on which is situated the dwelling house of the farmer.

(2) reimburse any Federal, State, or local government agency for conservation materials and services furnished by such agency to such producers; and

(3) pay expenses necessary in making such materials and services available to producers, including all or part of the cost incident to the delivery, application, or installation of materials and services.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in making conservation materials and services available to producers under this Act, the Secretary may make payments, in advance of determination of performance by the producers, to persons who fill purchase orders covering approved conservation materials or who render services to the Secretary in furnishing to producers approved conservation materials or services for the establishment by the producers of vegetative cover or water storage facilities, or other soil-, water-, wildlife-, or forest-conserving uses, under contracts authorized by this Act.

(2) If the Secretary determines that it is necessary in the interest of producers and the Government, the Secretary may limit in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary the price at which purchase orders for any conservation material or service are filled to a fair price.

UTILIZATION OF LOCAL AND STATE COMMITTEES

SEC. 313. In administering this Act in the continental United States, the Secretary shall utilize the services of local, county, and State committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590h(b)).

(1) the President should initiate negotiations with foreign countries in order to reach bilateral and multilateral agreements with such countries that would increase, to the maximum extent practicable, the export of United States agricultural commodities; and

(2) the Secretary of Agriculture should utilize existing statutory authority and funding to establish and expand programs to promote, to the maximum extent practicable, United States agricultural exports. By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. 251. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make permanent the rules relating to imputed interest and assumption of loans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

IMPUTED INTEREST LEGISLATION

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am joined by my distinguished colleague, Senator ZORINSKY, in introducing legislation to permanently solve the imputed interest problem.

Imputed interest provisions have been in the Tax Code since 1964. In 1979, when Treasury said that they were going to raise the imputed interest rate from 6 to 9 percent, I and other Members of the Senate had a great deal of reservations. Nevertheless, it was not until the 1981 tax bill that we were able to address this situation and we passed an amendment, adopted by the Senate 100 to nothing, to place some restrictions on the IRS as to when they could impose imputed interest rates. Then came the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act which contained rather draconian provisions allowing the IRS to interject itself between buyer and seller in a seller-finance transaction and impute large amounts of interest to the transaction. When the ramifications of these 1984 act provisions became widely known, there was an open outcry throughout the country by those who need seller financing to have an orderly real estate market. In a very short-time period, my Minneapolis and Washington offices received hundreds of calls and letters asking for relief from this provision. This same outpouring of urgent pleas was seen in the offices of my colleagues.

The Senate heard these pleas and we attempted over several days of debate to deal with this issue. The Senate ended by passing a very lengthy and complicated piece of legislation. Although extremely complex, it did provide some small measure of relief from the imputed interest problems. However, the House, who seemed to agree with my colleagues who thought the solution difficult to work with, did not accept the Senate version and set forth a simple temporary relief measure. A modified version of this proposal was finally accepted by Congress. Because the measure passed was temporary, it expires July 1, 1985, we need to address this issue again soon. We need to enact a permanent solution so that those contemplating seller-financed transactions can have some certainty as to the law.

What is imputed interest? What has caused this public outcry?

When property is sold under a contract calling for payments over an extended period of time, such as a home-mortgage, the transaction consists of two parts, a property-sales part and a financing part. In most such transactions, the two parts are completely separate; in most homes sales, for example, the seller receives the full sales price in cash and someone else, such as a bank, provides the financing to the buyer. When the seller and the financer are the same, however, as when a home seller takes back a mortgage for all or part of the sales price, it is sometimes difficult to separate the two parts of the transaction. The seller receives and the buyer pays a certain amount of money periodically, typically monthly, and a certain total amount over the length of the mortgage. For most purposes it does not matter to either of them what the payments are called.

But for tax purposes, it may matter a great deal to both of them. Payments for financing, for the use or forebearance of money, are interest, taxable as ordinary income to the recipient and frequently deductible by the payer. Payments for purchasing the property are payments of principal, consisting of reimbursement of the seller's investment, which is a nontaxable return of capital, and the seller's profit on the sale, which is usually taxed, if at all, at reduced capital gains rates. In addition, the portion of the total of all payments allocated to the purchase price becomes the buyer's cost basis for computing his gain when he sells the property and, in the case of business or investment property, his depreciation deductions and investment tax credits.

To make sure that these matters are allocated by law rather than by the wishes of each taxpayer, the Internal Revenue Code has for some time contained rules for determining if the contracts in such transactions had properly distinguished between principal and interest and for reallocating the payments if they had not. The IRS is required to scrutinize debt instruments for below-market interest rates giving rise to amounts of unstated interest and, when found, to impute an amount of interest based on market rates. The amount of interest that each payment would have contained if it had been computed at market rates is the imputed interest in that payment, and the rate of the payment is allocated to principal. Likewise, the total purchase price can be imputed by taking the present value of all future payments using the market interest rate as the discount rate. Once determined in this manner, an amount classified as interest is then treated as interest for all purposes under the income tax laws; it is the amount reported as interest income by the recipient and the amount allowed as a deduction by the payer.

The IRS has usually used its power to define unstated interest conservatively. For example, the pre-Deficit Reduction Act IRS rules for installment sales set the market rate used to test for unstated interest at only 9 percent simple interest, which is well below the current actual market rate. This leaves buyers and sellers considerable room to bargain.

Essentially then, the crux of the problem is that the 1984 act mandated to the Treasury Department that they could no longer use conservative figures for unstated interest. The result begins that parties have lost room to bargain, and at times of high interest rates this bargaining is essential to be able to sell homes, farms, and small businesses.

Proponents of stringent imputed interest rules talk about tax loopholes, and tax free, tax sheltered millionaires out there in business, the implication being that seller financing of real estate has somehow created a whole new class of millionaires in America.

The reality is that just ain't so. I mean seller financing was in this country long before we found the Government involved, in one way or another, either through its tax policy or through a variety of agencies of Government, in providing means by which property could be sold between sellers and buyers who would without Government arrange their own financing.

So the reality is we are making millionaires in this business in a couple of ways. One, over the last 15 years or so in particular, we have been making them with inflation. You go back and look at Forbes or some of those magazines that write about who the millionaires are in America, and a fair number of them were not made by the sweat of their brow. They were made by inflation.

I am going to take just a couple of minutes to share with my colleagues a little bit about the impact that inflation has had and how we have responded to that inflation because I think it is an important rationale for not messing around with seller financing at a time in the history of our country when that is one of the very few means of financing transactions available to use.

Before the depression, a lot of Americans were renters. Those who were not renters and could buy a home, they paid 50 percent down, and they paid the balance over 3 or 4 years. A lot of those arrangements were between buyers and sellers or maybe with the help of the hometown bank.

But when the depression hit us, home mortgage foreclosures swept across the country and in a variety of ways the Government got involved. The Roosevelt administration created the Federal Housing Agency, and eventually the FHA created a 30-year mortgage.

Pretty soon, we had those houses you could buy with nothing down and payments stretched over 30 years. Everybody in the country could become a homeowner. The Federal Government made all of this possible by guaranteeing loans, and if there was a default none of the bankers ever lost their money because the Federal Government was always around to make it good.

In the early years, mortgage payments were almost entirely interest. To ease the burden and encourage more homeownership, the Government made mortgage interest deductible. It is not surprising that we have a lot of people on this floor talking about homeowners and the problems they are facing. Nobody could pass up a deal like America was offering for homeownership in this country.

It is a national policy in this country to get your name signed up for 30 years.

Mr. President, I am going to give you one family to show you how wonderful this has been for all of us. Ten years ago, the family bought a home with an FHA loan that cost $34,000 with 5 percent down. Their initial investment was negligible, and the payments were $400 a month, $4,800 a year, almost all of that being tax deductible. Their costs were really $3,600 a year.

Last year, with two-thirds of the mortgage left they sold this house for $125,000. They got a $91,000 capital gain in 10 years for an initial investment of next to nothing.

You substract their annual cost of $3,600 from their annual gain of $9,100 and they were making $5,500 a year just being a homeowner.

Where did the $5,500 come from? It was not produced by the house. Once the house was built, it just sat there. Other than making a smart investment in the right suburb of the District of Columbia or some other city, the family really did not do anything to make $5,500.

Where did it come from? You know the answer to that. It was borrowed. In one national spiral of borrowing arranged by FHA and the Tax Code, this family now came out $55,000 ahead in just 10 years.

Mr. President, that is a true story and it has been repeated all over America many, many, many times. It has been replicated beyond housing in the area of business financing, commercial office buildings, you name it. That is how we made millionaires out of everybody in this country who has been smart enough to use this system we created.

We face a problem now as we come to grips with inflation. We used inflation to crank up the American dream and make it possible for everybody. Now we have decided to do war on inflation. So we have ourselves a big problem.

Logically, if you did war on inflation and you attacked all of these subsidies and loopholes and programs, the price of everything would come down.

Well, we cannot let the price of everything come down.

We cannot do it for a lot of people that the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Idaho, the Senator from Kansas, and I represent.

There is a whole bunch of folks out there, who I will call the American farmer. In the 1970's, the American farmer shared a spot right at the top of this up escalator with the homeowner. We had massive exports early in the decade, encouraging every farmer to plant for the world market, young farmers convinced the only way to get ahead was to expand, plant hedgerow to hedgerow. We brought 50 million acres, about one-sixth of the total farm acreage in this country, into production in that 10-year period of time. Again we set off a spiral of inflation and borrowing.

There is a helpful statistical relationship between the value of farmland in my State of Minnesota, for example, and outstanding farm debt. Early in the 1970's, the value of the typical acre on the farm in Minnesota was about $200. At that time, total farm debt in the State was a little under $2 billion. By the end of the decade, the debt climbed to over $10 billion and the value of an acre climbed to $1,000.

When you look at the charts, debt and value climbed year by year, together, right up the ladder.

But there was a third factor that made this possible. That was the exports. Farm exports are an important part of national policy, one of the principal elements we have been using until recently, at least, to keep our trade balance in balance.

The oil embargo forced energy outlays up and part of the answer was to raise farm exports. When the Third World was crushed with the high price of oil, part of the policy was to lower the price of farm goods.

All of that peaked out in the end of this decade. We had wound this spiral up so tight we could not push it another notch for the farmer.

The Fed decided that tight money must be used as a discipline. Interest rates went up to 20 and 22 percent, and that took the value of the dollar up right along with it. While the rate of the economy staggered through with difficult adjustments, the farmer was being wiped out because to him high interest is a double whammy. Not only did it have an impact on the cost of his money, but it also destroyed his market. Hungry nations simply cannot afford U.S. wheat priced in U.S. dollars.

The value of agricultural land in Minnesota has dropped by a third to a half because there is no longer an expanding market for the commodities that land produced. In Minnesota alone the loss in farm equity over the last 2 years is $7.448 billion, $7.5 billion lost in 2 years. That is $72,275 for the average 300-acre farm in my State. It is just a little more lost than the homeowner I was talking about made on his investment over the last 10 years.

The point, Mr. President, is that now land values will not support the amount of loans that we encouraged the American farmer to incur. Banks are reevaluating these loans and putting the farms out of business; 13,000 farmers may go out of business in Minnesota alone. We need to do something about this problem, but in the meantime, enactment of imputed interest provisions that do not allow for adequate safe harbors from imputed interest for the farmer who must sell land will kill the market for farmland and depress the price even further. Tax Code considerations are not the motivating factor here, but plain and simple survival.

Mr. President, these examples point up the severity of the problem, and it's safe to say that a majority of this body agrees we have a problem. The question then becomes what form does the solution take? I have some reservations about how we all too often devise solutions in this body. How the debate was set on this issue last Congress, provides a prime example.

Somebody stood up and said, hey, you are going to stop us from selling our homes. Somebody else got up and said, what are the farmers going to do about selling their farms? So the terms of the debate got set in terms of homes and farms, which is why I used the examples earlier in my comments today, and somebody else said what about my small business which I cannot sell at market rate. The issue was phrased in terms of business property rather than in terms of people. Nobody looked at it in terms of a person who may own a home, and a farm, or a business, or some combination of property.

As a result, the compromise legislation was drafted in those same kinds of terms, in terms of homes of one kind or another, in terms of businesses of this size, that size, or some other size. But it was never really put in the context of individuals.

The legislation we introduced today, tries to address the fact that it is individuals that we are dealing with. This means striving to simplify what is a complex area. The bill is based upon S. 3032 which I and a number of others introduced last year. It sets up a clear safe harbor for those who need relief from the Government intervention of imputed interest. Yet it is cognizant of Treasury Department concerns and retains prohibitions against what everybody agrees is the largest area for tax abuse—the mismatching of the seller reporting interest income and the buyer deducting the interest payment.

The bill sets up a simple safe harbor exemption. It takes care of the farmer, the small businessman, the borrower, and so forth, by providing that as long as a $2 million limit of borrowed amount is not exceeded the transaction is subject to a 9-percent test rate.

I want to stress how simple this is. It does not matter what kind of property is being sold.

It does not matter what the value of the property is. One need only look at the borrowed amount.

This bill just draws one line—below this line the test rate is capped at current law of 9 percent. Above this line the test rate is 80 percent of the applicable Federal rate.

Individuals have to live under the laws we create. Simplicity is something we must strive for and this legislation, particularly compared to other proposals, provides a simple, but effective solution to the imputed interest problem, that all parties concerned can live with.

I ask my colleagues to support this measure, action will have to come quickly—the temporary rules expire on July 1, 1984. If this rule expires we are left with what is contained in the 1984 act and I think we all agree that far too many individuals are hurt by these provisions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill, a fact sheet, and an article from the January 13 Washington Post be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACT SHEET ON IMPUTED INTEREST RATE BILL

I. This first section of the bill establishes the test rates and imputed rates for two tiers of transactions:

A. For transactions where the loan amount does not exceed $2 million, the applicable test rate shall be 9 percent or 80 percent of applicable federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) of the code, whichever is lower.

B. For transactions where the loan amount does not exceed $2 million, the applicable imputed rate shall be 10 percent or 100 percent of applicable federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) of the code, whichever is lower.

C. For transactions where the loan amount exceeds $2 million, the applicable test rate shall be a blend of the rate under (A) above, and 80 percent of applicable federal rates as determined under section 1274 (d) for the loan amount in excess of $2 million.

D. For transactions where the loan amount exceeds $2 million, the applicable imputed rate shall be a blend of the rate under (B) above, and 110 percent of applicable federal rates as determined under section 1274(d) for the loan amount in excess of $2 million.

E. All loan amounts from a single transaction or series of related transactions will be aggregated for purposes of determining loan amounts.

II. The bill prohibits the application of the original issue discount or imputed interest rules enacted in the 1984 Tax Act in cases of loan assumptions.

III. The bill repeals Section 1274(b) so as to permit a full deduction for the purchaser of the imputed interest, where applicable. This returns the state of the law to what existed prior to the 1984 Act.

IV. The bill makes needed conforming amendments because of the interrelation of sections of the Code dealing with Original Issue Discount rules and Imputed Interest Rate rules.

V. The bill's effective date is July 1, 1985, or date of enactment whichever is earlier.

FIGHT LOOMS IN CONGRESS OVER REAL ESTATE TAXES

(By Kenneth R. Harney)

The 99th Congress is barely a week old, but battle lines are forming over major real estate tax changes that could vitally affect American homeowners, renters, investors and developers in 1985 and beyond.

One of the hottest unresolved real estate issues of 1984—the socalled "imputed-interest-rate" controversy—popped up on the new year's agenda within hours of Congress' return. House Ways and Means Committee member Bill Archer (R-Tex.) readied legislation that would gut all the statutory provisions on imputed interest contained in the 1984 tax law.

Archer's bill would "wipe the slate clean again" for homeowners and investors, in the words of an aide. It would force the Internal Revenue Service to return to its traditional tax treatment of seller-financing of primary homes, vacation- and second-home property, farms, small businesses and commercial real estate, no matter how small or large the sale transaction.

When a seller assists a purchaser with below-market "take-back" mortgage financing, in other words, the IRS wouldn't bat an eyelash under the Archer plan, unless the rate on the note was below 9 percent. In that case, the IRS would define the true economic rate on the transaction as 10 percent.

Archer's clean-the-slate repeal bill would throw out not only the original changes on imputed interest in the 1984 tax-reform legislation signed into law by President Reagan last July, but the eleventh-hour modifications made to the law as Congress rushed to adjournment in October.

The original, complex law would have forced seller-financers of homes of $250,000 or less to charge their purchasers at least 110 percent of applicable Treasury borrowing rates (currently 13.4 to 13.5 percent) or face a higher imputed rate for federal-tax purposes, Sellers of commercial property, second homes, businesses and residences sold for more than $250,000 faced even steeper minimum federally set rates, ranging well above 15 percent in some cases.

The eleventh-hour compromise put these controversial changes on ice until July 1 for real-property transactions involving no more than $2 million where sellers' notes carried at least a 9 percent rate. Under the compromise, the 1984 tax-law provisions will take full legal effect after July 1 unless Congress steps in with a new solution.

A key member of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee, David Durenberger (R-Minn.), thinks he has such a solution—one more politically palatable to the Treasury, the president and revenue-raising Democrats than Archer's repeal plan.

Durenberger intends to introduce legislation that will exempt all residential and commercial transactions under either $1.5 million or $2 million from provisions of the 1984 Tax Reform Act. Property transactions above that level will need to carry a rate of just 80 percent of the applicable Treasury borrowing rate—10.7 percent currently—to escape special IRS scrutiny.

Although it is still too early to predict with certainty, Capitol Hill tax specialists say Durenberger's bill or something akin to it offers the best bet for real estate owners and investors this session. They argue that absolute repeal of the 1984 imputed-interest legislation would be difficult to get past the House Ways and Means Committee's tough chairman, Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), as well as Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), the two principal architects of last year's tax-law changes.

Repealing everything up to the $1.5 million or $2 million levels, on the other hand, "would give just about everybody what they want," according to a tax committee staff member.

Small-scale home sellers, buyers, farmers, businessmen and real estate investors "could forget that 1984 even happened," he said. Larger-scale investors and sellers also would get a lower minimum interest rate standard than under current tax law, and could easily adjust to the new system.

Whatever the ultimate solution to the imputed-rate controversy, it's likely to get tied up this spring with other tax and revenue issues on the congressional deficit-reduction docket. Ways and Means Committee member Bill Gradison (R-Ohio), for example, wants Congress to raise federal taxes on real estate dollar-for-dollar to cover any federal revenue losses caused by loosening the 1984 standards on imputed rates.

Fellow committee member Fortney (Pete) Stark (D-Calif.) has some provocative places to start. He is completing a bill that would tax all real estate limited partnerships with more than 35 investors as corporations. His bill would kill the multibillion-dollar real estate tax shelter industry in one fell swoop.

Stark also is considering a far more controversial concept: replacement of current capital-gains tax treatment on real estate sales and exchanges with an automatic national transfer tax, possibly as low as 4 percent.

All changes in ownership of houses, commercial buildings, apartments or land would be hit with the levy. Although the revenue estimates aren't complete, Stark's tax legislation advisers think that even a 4 percent transfer tax would raise more federal dollars than the current, deduction-laden system.

By Mr. ABDNOR:

S. 252. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit, South Dakota Pumping Division, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

LAKE ANDES-WAGNER UNIT

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to authorize the Lake Andes-Wagner irrigation project as a unit of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program. Congressman DASCHLE is introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives, and Senator PRESSLER has joined me in cosponsorship.

Mr. President, the proposed Lake Andes-Wagner unit is located in Charles Mix County, SD. A plan for irrigating about 45,000 acres has been developed and displayed in the updated Bureau of Reclamation's regional director's planning report. The project's benefit-cost ratio is 1.02 to 1, and according to our conversations with the Bureau, they believe this is a good project. We are very hopeful that with the administration's support, we can achieve enactment of the necessary authorization.

The Federal Government, Mr. President, made a commitment to my State in the Flood Control Act of 1944. Four mainstream dams were constructed in South Dakota to relieve the downstream States of chronic flooding. In return for the 509,000 acres of fertile, high quality land we were forced to give up, we were to receive irrigation development to compensate for our great loss. Needless to say, 41 years later, South Dakota is still waiting.

I do not believe many realize what happened to South Dakota 40 years ago. Imagine, if you will, someone coming into your State and rendering useless 138,000 acres of fertile river-bottom croplands, 238,000 acres of high-quality grazing lands, and 133,000 acres of bushland and timber. Many States could not withstand that type of severe loss, especially if the State is highly dependent upon agriculture, and today no State would stand for it.

Mr. President, I believe we must not only look at the past, but we must also look to the future. The Federal Government should have fulfilled its commitment to South Dakota earlier, but we now have the opportunity to look to the future. Irrigation projects, like the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit, can provide our economy with substantial benefits. Irrigation provides stabilization of our agricultural economy, assisting individual farmers and, in turn, main-street businesses and the economy of the State as a whole. This is a definite long-term benefit to our State and our people, despite the fact it obviously can never solve all of the problems plaguing our agricultural economy.

With the authorization of the Lake Andes-Wagner unit, Mr. President, South Dakota could partially realize the Federal Government's commitment. I believe this project is a good investment, just as the four mainstem dams were. Lake Andes-Wagner possesses the unique quality of having economic feasibility and dedicated local support. Even more importantly, with this project, we are looking toward the future development of our economy in a positive and progressive way. I am, therefore, extremely pleased to introduce this measure today so that we can begin to realize the benefits of the commitments which have been made to us, and so that we can begin the process toward development of this project which has been supported so strongly and in such a dedicated fashion by the local people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill to authorize the Lake Andes-Wagner unit be reprinted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to the Federal Reclamation laws (Acts of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388 and Acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto), is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit, South Dakota Pumping Division, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program, South Dakota, substantially in accordance with the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit Report I and draft environmental statement, for the purpose of providing irrigation water, conserving fish and wildlife, and providing other beneficial uses for approximately forty-five thousand acres of land. The principal features of the project include a main pumping plant located on Lake Francis Case, relift plants, a main canal system, and a drainage system. The project will also include measures to mitigate for project caused wildlife habitat impacts.

SEC. 2. The Lake Andes-Wagner Unit shall be integrated physically and financially with the other Federal works constructed under the comprehensive plan approved by section 9 of the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 887. 891), as amended and supplemented. Repayment contracts for the return of construction costs allocated to irrigation will be based on the water user's ability to repay as determined by the Secretary of the Interior; and the terms of such contracts shall not exceed forty years following the permissible development period. A portion of the reimbursable costs for irrigation service to Indian-owned lands will be indefinitely deferred under the Leavitt Act authority. Reimbursable costs associated with conservation and development of fish and wildlife resources in connection with the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit shall be in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Water Projects Recreation Act (79 Stat. 213), as amended by section 77 of Public Law 93-251.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for construction of the Lake Andes-Wagner Unit the sum of $155,110,000 (indexed to January 1984 price level) plus or minus such amounts, if any, as may be required by reason of changes in construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indexes applicable to the types of construction involved and, in addition thereto, such sums as may be required for operation and maintenance of the works of said area.●

By Mr. ABDNOR:

S. 253. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Central South Dakota Water Supply System (CENDAK unit) Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program, South Dakota; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CENTRAL SOUTH DAKOTA WATER SUPPLY SYSTEM ACT OF 1985

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation to authorize the proposed CENDAK unit of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program. S. 253 is an update of S. 2189 introduced in the 98th Congress, upon which a field hearing was conducted in Pierre, SD, last February by the Subcommittee on Water and Power of the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. In addition, a detailed hearing was held here in Washington on July 24, 1984, by the Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The proposed CENDAK unit would be constructed in two stages to provide water for irrigation, municipal and rural uses, wildlife enhancement, recreation, improved water quality in the James River and for other purposes. Stage 1 development would irrigate approximately 300,000 acres in a 6-county area which could be served by completion of the unfinished Oahe unit pumping plant and main canals. These unfinished features, together with completed storage and power features, the costs of which are allocated to irrigation, represent a sunk Federal investment in first-stage works of over $180 million not yet used for irrigation. Stage 2 development would irrigate approximately 174,000 acres and supply water for other purposes. Sunk Federal costs in storage and power features which would be used for irrigation in stage 2 aggregate $87 million.

I want to emphasize and call to the attention of my colleagues some of the unique features that distinguish the CENDAK unit from most irrigation projects, and certainly from any project ever authorized by Congress in the Missouri River Basin.

First, planning studies have been conducted as a three-party effort by the State, Bureau of Reclamation and CENDAK, with the State and local supporters investing well over $1 million in those studies to date. The studies show the project to be feasible from economic and engineering standpoints. CENDAK farmers now successfully irrigate approximately 30,000 acres, some for over 25 years, despite having only a limited supply of poor-quality ground water.

Second, State and grassroots support also is evidenced by current preparation and consideration of State legislation which would establish the CENDAK irrigation district and commit it and its water users to carrying out specific water and energy conservation measures, on-farm wildlife mitigation actions, and the establishment of mechanisms for locally financed reserve funds for any future drainage needs.

Third, use of modern technology for careful scheduling of sprinkler irrigation to match climatic changes will result in water, soil, and energy conservation and is ideally suited to the highly productive glacial till soils of central South Dakota.

Fourth, the high irrigation efficiency to be achieved through technically scheduled sprinkler irrigation will result in an average of only 1.46 acre feet of water per irrigated acre being diverted from the Missouri River, as compared to 2.97 acre feet of water per irrigated acre for the presently authorized Oahe unit. The conserved water would remain in the river and, as it moves downstream, is capable of generating more than twice as much energy as needed to provide CENDAK sprinkler pressure.

Fifth, the scattered nature of fields to be irrigated in combination with dryland farming and pasture lands on each farm will provide excellent opportunities for wildlife enhancement and result in minimal adverse environmental impact. Where such impacts do occur, they will be mitigated on-farm by the water users in most instances. Water users will be committed by contract to provide much mitigation.

Sixth, livestock production represents a large part of South Dakota's economy. Periodic droughts, such as occurred in the 1970's and early 1980's have been disastrous for the economy, and farmers have not recovered financially from the 1970's. The entire regional economy is in poor condition with South Dakota consistently ranking near the bottom in listings by States of per capita income. Population in the CENDAK area continues to decline. Irrigation development of the CENDAK unit would provide a firm feed and forage base for livestock and thereby stabilize the regional economy.

Seventh, in the six-State Great Plains area to the south of the CENDAK unit, lands over the Ogallala aquifer are going out of irrigation and back to dryland farming at a rate of approximately 120,000 acres per year because of overpumping. Development of CENDAK's 474,000 acres from dryland farming to irrigation would offset only approximately 4 years of the production losses taking place over the Ogallala aquifer.

The United States took approximately 530,000 acres of riverbottom lands out of production and off the tax rolls for construction and operation of four of the six main-stem dams and reservoirs on the Missouri River so as to provide flood control, navigation, power, and other benefits to downstream and neighboring States. The United States' commitment to provide offsetting water resources development in South Dakota was real and is long overdue. Authorization and construction of the CENDAK unit would fulfill much of the commitment.

In passing Public Law 97-273 in 1982, we authorized the Secretary of the Interior in cooperation with the State of South Dakota to conduct investigations to determine, among other things, alternate uses of facilities constructed for use in conjunction with the Oahe unit. The proposed CENDAK unit appears to be an excellent and logical replacement for the presently authorized Oahe unit, as well as opportunity to put the sunk Federal investment of over a quarter-of-a-billion dollars to work and get some benefits flowing back to South Dakota and the Nation.

While current budgetary pressures are undeniable and do not bode well for this excellent project at the present time, South Dakotans have a right to expect it to be fully and fairly considered. Forty-one years is a long time to wait, and many farmers and ranchers in the CENDAK area have suffered needlessly the ravages of drought for far too long. Nevertheless, it is far better to begin today to try to right the wrong which has been done than to wait still longer. With the active support of the Reagan administration, I am hopeful it will be possible to move in that direction, and I earnestly request the thoughtful consideration of my colleagues.●

S. 260. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the substantiation requirements of section 274(d) of such code may be met, in the case of passenger automobiles and other transportation property, of the taxpayer provides substantial evidence other than contemporaneous records; to the Committee on Finance.

RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS RELATING TO BUSINESS USE OF AUTOMOBILES

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing, with Senator PRYOR and a large number of distinguished colleagues as cosponsors, a bill to repeal the provision of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 which requires that taxpayers must maintain contemporaneous records for the business and personal use of automobiles and trucks in order to qualify for a business tax deduction or credit. We believe that the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement for automobiles and trucks is burdensome and in many situations will have the unfortunate result of denying legitimate business deductions.

This provision adversely affects all segments of the business and agriculture communities in a heavyhanded and needless way. Let me give you a few examples. Realtors are constantly in their cars—showing houses, listing properties, viewing new properties on the market, and going to the mortgage company. Each time they drive for a business reason, they must record the purpose of the trip, the date, and mileage. For someone who is constantly in his car for business reasons, it becomes an impossible burden to require them to keep track of every trip. Or consider the farmer who works 60 or even 80 hours a week. Each time he picks up supplies, deliver goods, or works his land, he is required to record each trip and the purpose of that trip. Farmers would have to rely on their workers to keep an accurate log or lose a legitimate business deduction. There are 107,000 farm workers in Pennsylvania and that amounts to a lot of paperwork. Or consider building contractors who are building several houses. Each time they travel between sites, meet with the architect, or pick up supplies, or have someone else do this in their car, they would have to record each trip. It is an impossible and ridiculous task. Or consider the florist who makes dozens of deliveries daily. That florist would have to depend on his or her delivery people to record each trip, stop after stop. Are they expected to record each stop as a different trip? Employers of several employees must rely on each employee to fill out a log or else lose a legitimate deduction. I do not believe that this is the result which Congress intended.

The bill that we are introducing today will return to the criteria in operation prior to the Deficit Reduction Act. Prior to the beginning of 1985, in order for a taxpayer to qualify for a business expense deduction for automobiles and trucks, he was required to maintain adequate records or have other significant evidence to corroborate his own statement. The law has always required that adequate records be kept, but I believe that the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement goes too far.

The Internal Revenue Service has recently interpreted the contemporaneous records provision to require that a detailed log be kept of all business use of the vehicle, or no deduction or credits will be allowed. The journal must include the date, operator, purpose, and mileage of all business use. This interpretation places a tremendous time and paperwork burden on all businesses. A daily journal of all business use goes beyond what is reasonable to justify a deduction. I believe that the easiest way to take care of the problem is to return to prior law, which is exactly what this bill does.

The reason for the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement was Treasury's concern that many taxpayers take advantage of the investment tax credit and accelerated depreciation with respect to automobiles and other property used primarily for personal or investment use rather than in a trade or business. While Treasury has some very legitimate concerns, I think the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement is not the right approach. I look forward to working with Treasury to find a fair and practical solution to address its concerns, but until hearings can be held and a workable solution found that does not cause severe hardship for honest taxpayers, I think the correct approach is to return to prior law.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 also contained provisions under the fringe benefit section which, will require that employees be taxed on the value of the personal use portion of their company car. The purpose of the provision is to prevent companies from providing "company cars" as a form of nontaxable income to their executives. It is a goal I fully support; I am worried however, about the impact this provision will have on small businesses, where the use of a company car is not for tax avoidance. The mandatory withholding requirement does not take effect until July 1, 1985, and, therefore, the bill that we are introducing today does not address this issue. I do intend, however, to ask Senator PACKWOOD to hold hearings on the fringe benefit portion of the act to determine its impact on small businesses and the correlation between the fringe benefit section and the contemporaneous recordkeeping provisions.

I would like to make it clear that our bill does not repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement for airplanes, boats, computers, or other personal property used in a trade or business. I believe that it is possible for business men and women to keep these records without presenting any undue hardship or burden on their normal working day.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 imposed a duty upon CPA's and accountants to notify their clients of this provision. Well, they did a good job, because I am hearing from my constituents. These are business men and women from all segments of the business and agriculture community, and they are outraged. These people feel that the Internal Revenue Code is already too complex, and that this provision only compounds their frustrations. Given today's interest in tax code simplification I find this an ironic achievement. I believe we have again imposed unacceptable burdensome Federal regulations on honest taxpayers with very little benefit to the Government. We have stood reasonableness and simplicity on its head and it is time to right this wrongheaded approach.

Mr. President, this legislation should be enacted without delay. Restoring the prior law will restore some rational recordkeeping requirement in this area, and will substantially reduce a paperwork burden which has gotten out of hand. I urge my fellow Senators to join in this effort, and ensure its swift passage.●

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, along with the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. HEINZ, and several other colleagues, I'm pleased to introduce this legislation to repeal the automobile recordkeeping requirements that were contained in the Tax Reform Act of 1984. The bill we're introducing today also repeals the new fine of $25 on tax return preparers that was put into the law to go along with the new recordkeeping requirements.

Mr. President, there are very few issues that come along where we can truly say it's a grassroots effort. I can assure other Members of the Senate, however, that the need to repeal these provisions is in fact a grassroots effort. It's virtually impossible to count the number of phone calls, letters, and personal conversations I've received on this issue. In my opinion, the failure to repeal these provisions—and the regulations issued by the Internal Revenue Service—or significantly change them, will erode confidence in our tax system and enormously increase the paperwork burden of all businesses, their employees, and farmers.

I think a little background on this issue will be informative, Mr. President. In 1983 there were several newspaper advertisements which stated that a person could substantially reduce his tax bill by purchasing an expensive—luxury—car. The availability of the investment tax credit—6 percent—and accelerated cost recovery, if the car was used for business purposes, was very attractive, and could significantly reduce the cost of an expensive car. This was felt to be an abuse of the tax system and several bills were introduced to limit the cost—basis—of the car that could be used to figure the investment tax credit and ACRS. The final version of the bill took a different route, but still capped the ITC at a maximum of $1,000—regardless of the purchase price of the car—and put annual limits on ACRS deductions—$4,000 the first year and $6,000 each year thereafter, until the full cost was recovered.

In addition, the substantial requirements of section 274 of the Tax Code were changed to disallow a deduction for travel and other specified expenses, unless adequate contemporaneous records were kept. I opposed this change in the Senate Finance Committee. As interpreted by the IRS, this means keeping a detailed travel log setting out the date of the trip, the person's name, the purpose of the trip, and the mileage driven. Before this change, Mr. President, the substantian rules of section 274 required adequate records or by sufficient evidence corroborating his own statement before a deduction could be taken. This standard was sufficient, and the bill we're introducing today would return to that provision. To the extent that luxury cars were the problem the limits on the investment credit and accelerated depreciation will stop it.

These new recordkeeping rules are burdensome; they take up too much time; and they have dramatically increased the paperwork burden on businesses, farmers, and their employees. If we continue at this rate, Mr. President, instead of having a coffee break, or lunch hour, we're going to have a form filling out period each day. Repealing this provision as soon as possible makes good business and economic sense, and it will let businesses and their employees return to productive activities. To the extent other abuses might occur, we can find more logical and less burdensome ways to correct them.

Before I close, I just want to pose a few of the problems that are occurring. First, what about a farmer and his employees when they work 80 to 100 hours per week and are constantly in and out of their trucks? Requiring them to log each of these trips is not what anyone intended. Second, what about a logger who works in the woods and makes several trips to a mill? Third, what about people who are on call at all hours of the day and night? Many of them might not have the time to log these trips; so should we deny the deduction simply because it wasn't recorded at the moment it occurred? These are just a few of the many questions that exist, Mr. President.

For all of these reasons I hope other members of the Senate will join in this effort. Changing these rules will restore some rational recordkeeping to this area; the new luxury car provisions will stop one known abuse; and, we'll substantially reduce a paperwork burden that's gotten out of hand. I hope this can be approved by the Senate in the very near future.●

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise in support of this legislation to repeal the provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act that requires contemporaneous recordkeeping in order to qualify for a business tax deduction or credit for the business and personal use of automobiles and trucks.

The interpretation of this legislation by the Internal Revenue Service is tantamount to bureaucratic redtape for the businesses of our community. It is one of the biggest road blocks to have ever put in their path, and will severely prohibit their efforts to operate in an efficient and profitable manner. Each time the vehicle is used for business or personal reason, a separate and detailed entry must be made in a log. The entry must specify the date the property was used, the name of the user, the number of miles and the purpose of the use. Unless all of this information is provided, the tax deduction or credit will not be allowed.

It is clear that this will prove to be a time consuming and aggravating requirement for those millions of business men and women who utilize their vehicle many times a day for their businesses. The citrus industry in my State uses lightweight vehicles extensively. The foreman, the owner—everyone is moving from grove to grove all day long. The car is literally a moving office for that industry and these rules will severely cripple their ability to conduct their day-to-day business. Imagine the tedious task if we were required to make some kind of detailed entry each time we sat down to our desk to conduct business. I believe that this comparison sheds light on the difficulties these provisions create.

The requirements in effect prior to 1984 are certainly preferable to these provisions. The maintenance of adequate records or sufficient evidence corroborating the taxpayers' claim for such a business deduction served its purpose well, and is far superior to this ridiculous imposition. The bill being introduced today will only repeal those provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act pertaining to cars, trucks, vans, and so forth, and will enable us to return to the eligibility criteria in operation prior to 1984.

Mr. President, a horrendous burden has been created. It is clear that these rules go beyond reason and must be corrected. If each Senator in this Chamber has not yet heard from his or her constituency on this matter, I guarantee that they will soon. This effects a vast number of hardworking men and women in our Nation, and they will want and need relief.●

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have this opportunity to cosponsor legislation which will repeal the new Internal Revenue Service regulation that requires extensive, detailed recordkeeping for cars and trucks used for both personal and business purposes.

I am strongly opposed to these new requirements. The new rules will be a paperwork nightmare for small businessmen, farmers, and individual taxpayers who are already overburdened by excessive paperwork.

The new IRS regulations, which are effective for the 1985 tax year, require strict contemporaneous recordkeeping for the business use of automobiles and other vehicles. Previous law required documentation for business use of vehicles, but contemporaneous recordkeeping was not required. Under the new rules, taxpayers must keep detailed logs of vehicle use or no tax deduction or credit will be allowed.

Compliance with the new recordkeeping requirement will be almost impossible for many taxpayers. Individual taxpayers must report the destination, odometer reading, and mileage for every business stop. A typical salesman who makes eight calls per day will log his mileage over 2,000 times a year. Most trips made by small businesses, usually to the bank or post office are just a short distance away. To record the mileage on these trips is not only time consuming, but an excessive burden.

The recordkeeping requirement will also be an added expense for businesses. In many instances, businesses may have to hire an additional clerk just to keep the additional records.

Farmers, sawmill operators, and other small rural businesses often operate with very little paperwork, and therefore, will be especially burdened by the new IRS regulations. In general, the recordkeeping requirement will be a headache and a harassment for all taxpayers affected.

In my view, the new requirement will divert small business efforts from productivity to petty recordkeeping, encourage dishonesty among taxpayers and could actually cost more to administer for many businesses than the total value of the tax deductions or credits that the business could legitimately claim. While I support efforts to close tax loopholes and to improve compliance with the Tax Code to help reduce the Federal deficits, I do not believe that these new requirements are justified. These complex rules will reduce taxpayer cooperation and confidence in the Federal tax system. They also reinforce the need for simplification of our Tax Code laws.

I have heard from hundreds of my constituents who are opposed to the IRS regulation, and I urge my Senate colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.●

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in introducing legislation to repeal provisions in the Tax Reform Act of 1984 which require taxpayers to keep "adequate contemporaneous records" to substantiate the business use of motor vehicles.

This new contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement was included in the 1984 tax bill as part of a effort to tighten up on the deductibility of business assets that are used in part for personal purposes. I agree on the need to tighten up our tax laws to prevent the tax avoidance that occurs when individuals claim a business deduction for what is in fact a personal expense.

In the 1984 tax bill, new rules were enacted to limit the value of automobiles and other vehicles that may be claimed as a business asset for depreciation and investment tax credit purposes. In addition a new rule was created requiring that such an asset be used at least 50 percent of the time for business purposes before being eligible for the ITC and ACRS investment incentives.

Those changes had widespread support in Congress. They were approved by the Ways and Means Committee and debated on the Senate floor. However, in the conference committee a new provision was added to require that contemporaneous records be kept every time such an asset is used. This means, for example, that an employee of a small company who uses a van to make deliveries must note in a journal or log every stop he makes. He must record the date of delivery, the purpose of the delivery and the exact mileage that the delivery van was used. This is required even where the deliver van is used 100 percent of the time for business purposes. If "adequate contemporaneous records" are not kept, no depreciation deduction or investment tax credit is allowed.

In my opinion this goes too far.

This kind of recordkeeping requirement just does not make sense. It burdens every taxpayer in America who owns a transportation vehicle that is used in their trade or business. In order to assist the IRS in catching a minority of individuals who stretch the law, we are punishing everyone else. This is clearly not the proper answer to the problem. It suggests either a total ignorance of common business practices or a cavalier disregard for the excessive administrative burdens imposed on taxpayers. And to the extent that this kind of burdensome recordkeeping requirement is imposed on everyone, it breeds contempt for our tax laws and undermines our voluntary assessment tax system. It creates a perception of unfairness toward our Internal Revenue laws that, in the long run, reduces rather than increases tax compliance.

To be sure, the IRS faces a formidable task in attempting to enforce our complicated Tax Code; Congress must equip the Service with the means to prevent widespread tax avoidance. But a balance must be struck between what is necessary to prevent tax abuse and what is a reasonable burden to impose on the tax paying public. We have tipped the balance in this case and in my opinion the "adequate contemporaneous record" requirement must be changed.

This legislation repeals the new requirement for contemporaneous records only as it applies to motor vehicles. It does not deal with the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement for entertainment and travel expenses and for business gifts. After repeal, prior law would go back into effect to require the taxpayer to maintain adequate records or have other sufficient evidence corroborating the business use of the vehicle. If this is insufficient to prevent individuals from abusing the law, when I believe a new rule should be devised to limit tax avoidance. But I cannot support the current law requiring contemporaneous record keeping for all transportation vehicles that are susceptible to personal use.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join several of my distinguished colleagues in cosponsoring a bill, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, JOHN HEINZ, to repeal a provision in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 which forces taxpayers who use their trucks or cars for business purposes to maintain detailed daily logs of all business travel.

This contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement for automobiles and trucks is overly burdensome and, in many cases, will have the unfortunate result of denying legitimate business deductions. The new recordkeeping requirement creates more trouble and expense than it could possibly be worth. Once again, the bureaucracy is trying to drown the average citizen in a sea of paperwork. Farmers, ranchers, and small business persons don't have the time to make daily loggings of where they're going, who they're seeing and why. This is too much governmental intrusion.

The requirement imposed by the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 requires not only that taxpayers have to keep daily logs, but also that they have to certify in a written statement to their tax preparer that the records were kept on a daily—or contemporaneous—basis. If it cannot be proven that the records were kept contemporaneously with the use, the deduction could be denied by the Internal Revenue Service. Additionally, the taxpayers could also be liable for a negligence penalty if they underpay their taxes as a result of inaccurate records.

The taxpayer using the car or truck must make a separate entry in the log every time the vehicle is used and must specify the date of the use, the name of the user of the vehicle, the number of miles and the purpose of the use.

The requirement also imposes a duty on preparers of taxpayer returns, such as certified public accountants, bookkeepers, and others, to notify the taxpayer of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement and obtain written confirmation from the taxpayer certifying that adequate contemporaneous records were in fact maintained. A preparer failing to do this would be subject to a $25 fine.

I raised a number of specific points of concern when the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 was considered in the Finance Committee. While it is certainly within the Federal Government's role to assure that deduction taken by taxpayers are legitimate, when substantiating deductions becomes this burdensome and costly, it is entirely unfair and counterproductive. Not only do I object to its costliness and burdensomeness, but I feel the provision will encourage taxpayers to forge records or forgo legal deductions and credits which they would have been entitled to but for the absence of a contemporaneous record.

At a minimum, the IRS should consider alternatives to this unfair and costly practice. One possibility would be to set industry-by-industry percentages which persons in those industries could use as a flat figure for writing off vehicular use as a business expense. If an individual felt he or she had more business use of the vehicle than allowed by this flat percentage, the individual would have the option of keeping the contemporaneous travel logs to prove usage above the percentage rate.

While working toward repeal or an alternative solution, I would urge that the Secretary of the Treasury suspend this regulation requiring recordkeeping until Congress has time to consider alternatives.

Today, I am circulating a letter to other Senators for their signature urging Treasury Secretary Donald Regan to take this action.

I invite my colleagues to join in signing this letter to Secretary Regan, and to support our move to repeal this unfair and costly paperwork burden which has been imposed on the American taxpayer.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to add my name as an original cosponsor to important corrective tax legislation being introduced by several of my good friends and colleagues on the Senate Finance Committee, including JOHN HEINZ, STEVE SYMMS, DAVE PRYOR, and DAVE BOREN. This bipartisan bill will replace the requirements, included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, that taxpayers must maintain "contemporaneous records" to support their legitimate business deductions for auto and truck use with a far more reasonable requirement for "adequate records or * * * sufficient evidence corroborating taxpayer's own statements."

The effect of this legislation would be to return to the criteria enforced prior to 1984. In order to take a business deduction for use of a vehicle, a taxpayer will only be required to maintain adequate records or to have other sufficient evidence corroborating his or her own statement. The onerous burden requiring a four part contemporaneous record, established pursuant to the Deficit Reduction Act, will be eliminated.

Although expanded recordkeeping may improve compliance with our Tax Code, there are times when the added paperwork increases to a point that the burden is too onerous. In this situation, the requirement is counterproductive and should be eliminated. That is what we are trying to do here.

Mr. President, this legislation should be enacted without delay. Only in this way can we assure constituents that they will be able to claim their legitimate business deductions this year without having to maintain an incredibly cumbersome set of records.●

By Mr. GARN (for himself, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DENTON, Mr. EAST, Mr. FORD, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HATFIELD, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. HELMS, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. MCCONNELL):

S.J. Res. 19. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the protection of unborn children and other persons; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FOR THE PROTECTION OF UNBORN CHILDREN AND OTHER PERSONS

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join with 20 of my colleagues to offer an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to protect human life. As you know, today, January 22, 1985, marks the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court's decisions legalizing abortion. It is fitting that we join together on this anniversary to both censure the Court's grievous error and to mourn the deaths of those millions of unborn children who have become victims of it. It is my concern about the destruction of these tiny beings, as well as the abuse of those rights guaranteed to all of us in our Constitution, that leads me once again to introduce this amendment. I have sponsored it previously in the 95th, 96th, 97th, and 98th Congresses. Its message is simple and absolute. It will allow the Constitution to once again protect the lives of unborn children and other human beings "irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency."

Initially, may I thank those in this body who have joined with me in cosponsoring this effort. I appreciate your support, not only as colleagues, but because it is an indicator to me of the broad and ever-increasing support among the people of our Nation in the effort to resolve the tragedy of abortion. Second, may I thank the thousands of those who have come to this city and the millions of those throughout our country who have gathered to peacefully protest the Supreme Court's decisions, as well as mourn the violent deaths of the unborn that continue to take place even as we speak here today. I lend my voice to the protest and call upon you in this Congress to join with me.

That the Supreme Court erred in its holding in 1973 is unquestionable. The Court assumed for itself a legislative role and in effect wrote a statute governing abortions for the entire country, a statute more permissive than those enacted by any of the 50 States before that time. I think that it is fair to say that these abortion decisions are the most criticized decisions or our time. In fact, criticism is often leveled by those who, for the most part, are proabortion. But they not only recognize the necessity for judicial restraint, they respect the explicit language of the Constitution, the implications that are reasonably derived therefrom, the powers of the States within our system of government, and certainly the moral beliefs and sensibilities of the people of the United States. The abortion decisions ought to be overturned by a constitutional amendment primarily because of the human havoc they are spreading. But they ought also to be overturned because they are an affront to the excellence that ought to characterize our constitutional law. As Archibald Cox has said:

> The Justices read into the generalities of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment a new "fundamental right" not remotely suggested by the words. Because they found the right to be "fundamental", the Justices felt no duty to defer to the value judgments of the people's elected representatives, current as well as past.

We also know that the Court has erred before in its decisionmaking. It is proved by a quick glance into our history. As President Reagan pointed out:

> This is not the first time our country has been divided by a Supreme Court decision that denied the value of certain human lives. The Dred Scott decision of 1857 was not overturned in a day, or a year or even a decade. At first, only a minority of Americans recognized and deplored the moral crisis brought about by denying the full humanity of our black brothers and sisters; but that minority persisted in their vision and finally prevailed. They did it by appealing to the hearts and minds of their countrymen, to the truth of human dignity under God. From their example, we know that respect for the sacred value of human life is too deeply engrained in the hearts of our people to remain forever suppressed.

Those who were the victims of slavery bore the literal wounds of that long-ago Court decision, but we as a nation suffered as well. In 1973, the Court again denied the value of certain human lives and many in our Nation have suffered because some of us are deprived of our constitutional rights. Have we not as a nation suffered enough. And isn't it the unconscionable tragedy that millions of unborn citizens, who are bearing the literal punishment of this decision, continue to lose their lives as a result of the Court's errors.

The abortion issue is often addressed as a conflict of rights; namely, a woman's right to control her own body versus the unborn child's right to live. Of course, none of the statutes which have come before the Congress presume to force a woman to become pregnant, to prohibit the use of contraceptives, or to otherwise regulate the kind of behavior which results in pregnancy. We all agree that these are areas in which men and women should properly be in control. The fact that is so conveniently overlooked, though, is that once a woman becomes pregnant, another separate living human being is then involved which ought to have some sort of protection.

Because the Supreme Court entirely disregarded this fact does not justify our doing so. Medical and biological science teaches unequivocally that a new life begins at conception, not at birth. After all, the remarkable thing about Louise Brown, and others like her, was not the circumstance of her birth, so much as the circumstance of her conception. Her beginning was most definitely not at birth, and the same is true of all of us. Other medical advances are changing the way that many regard life in the womb. Surgery performed on fetuses to correct medical problems before birth is becoming more common daily. Premature babies are surviving at younger and younger ages. Doctors and others at last are acknowledging the very real horror that fetuses must endure tortuous pain as a result of many of the abortion techniques. The moral and ethical questions of responsibility when a baby survives an abortion are being addressed. And in other countries, the civil and inheritance rights of frozen embryos in a dish are being tried and affirmed. Given all of this, by no stretch of the imagination is it possible to say that a nonviable fetus at 7 or 8 months' gestation—who is eligible for abortion under Roe versus Wade—is not human or alive by comparison with the newborn at 9 months' gestation.

It is the value question, then, that we must address. What value do we give to any human life? The Declaration of Independence states it clearly:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Supreme Court, however, says that a mother—isn't it interesting that the Court refers to a woman who is carrying a fetus as a mother?—has the right to end the life of her fetus in order to continue leading a life she prefers. But is human life so inconsequential that the difference depends only upon whether or not a child is wanted or convenient? Can one infant be human and another subhuman or nonhuman simply at the stroke of his or her mother's pen as she consents to the destruction of the separate life she carries. I know these can be difficult, even heart-rending questions, but I must continue to stand for the supremacy of human life itself. Not meaningful life, nor wanted life, nor normal life, nor convenient life, but simply life itself.

Advocates of abortion often speak as though they have some kind of corner on rights, justice, equality, and humanitarianism. They are free to believe that, if they wish, but I don't think there can be much justice or humaneness in a philosophy which espouses abortion on demand. In the past two decades we have focused increasingly on civil rights, human rights, and discrimination. This emphasis has extended even into our foreign policy. We have bent over backward to guarantee civil rights, even affirmative action, which sometimes infringes on the rights of others. We have children's rights advocates, who choose to ignore the most basic right of the tiniest and most helpless of our children. Many people even advocate animal rights. How ironic it is, then, that as a nation we continue to blithely deny the rights and very humanity of a whole class of people. After an abortion there can be no affirmative action to compensate for past discrimination. Many in the women's movement have even claimed elective abortion as a cornerstone of feminism. Surely the emphasis on expanding a woman's opportunities is at odds with a philosophy that so effectively squelches the opportunities of another. Fortunately, growing numbers of women are coming to this realization, and groups of feminists for life are springing up.

Obviously, arguments about the meaningfulness of life have value only after the right to life has been recognized. This is not to minimize the size and cost of problems resulting from unwanted pregnancies or potential birth defects. It is unfortunately the case that there are too few families, neighbors, churches, and communities that offer meaningful assistance to rape victims, parents of the handicapped, or pregnant teenagers. But this is no justification of the deliberate termination of innocent human life. Dignified and charitable alternatives can and must be expanded at each of these levels. To so willingly abandon the search in favor of such violence demonstrates an appalling lack of imagination and belief in ourselves.

Mr. President, I offer this amendment in order to guarantee the unborn their right to live. Donald De Marco, in an article entitled, "Abortion: Fear of the Actual and Preference for the Possible," says:

> By withholding this right (to life, itself) all other alleged rights become at best mere adjuncts to privilege. If one does not have a right to enter the theater of life, he or she has no claim to the goods that exist therein. * * * (*This) makes as much sense as someone making himself the beneficiary of his own will: one cannot be heir to life's fortune if he or she is not first heir to life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 19

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission by the Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. With respect to the right to life, the word 'person', as used in this article and in the fifth and fourteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, applies to all human beings, irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every stage of their biological development.

"SECTION 2. No unborn person shall be deprived of life by any person: Provided, however, That nothing in this article shall prohibit a law permitting only those medical procedures required to prevent the death of the mother.

"SECTION 3. Congress and the several States shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation within their respective jurisdictions."

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, like the other two branches of government, the Federal judiciary is a fallible institution. That fallibility has never been more evident than in the 1973 Supreme Court decision of Roe versus Wade. Although some people still applaud that abominable decision, the pro-life movement has grown stronger during the past 12 years as the barbarity of human abortion has become more clear and more widespread.

Supporters of the right to life have helped elect a President who shares their revulsion against abortion. Pro-life legislators have ended all Federal funding of abortion, and the President has halted international aid to groups that promote abortion as a means of birth control. In 1981, Congress established the first federally supported abortion alternatives program. Pro-life doctors and researchers have led the way in educating us about the humanity of the unborn. Ministers, priests, and rabbis are decrying human abortion as never before. Hundreds of new centers have opened their doors to offer hope and care to pregnant women. Across the country, volunteers are staffing hotlines and shelters. In State after State, peaceful men, women, and children have stood before abortion clinics to demonstrate community opposition to the killing within.

Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from Utah, Senator GARN, as an original cosponsor of this joint resolution and to express my strongest support for his proposed constitutional amendment to protect the lives of unborn children by removing any question that these children are persons within the meaning of our Constitution.

I am still amazed and repulsed that any court could find some implicit right to destroy an unwanted human being from the document that provides for and protects the liberties and human rights of the citizens of the greatest free nation in the world. It is time that we, as a nation, reaffirm the fundamental and inalienable right to life that was stated in the Declaration of Independence and that is an essential part of the very foundation of our country.

We must put an end to the practice of abortion which has claimed more than 15 million innocent human lives during the past 12 years, and we must do everything in our power to restore fully the most fundamental of human rights to the unborn: the right to life.

Thank you, Mr. President.

By Mr. SYMMS (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. DENTON, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. EAST, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S.J. Res. 20. A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the English language; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AMENDMENT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today I have the honor of reintroducing the English language amendment.

Since the amendment was first introduced in 1981 by Senator Hayakawa, it has gained steady recognition by the press, and—more importantly—enthusiastic acceptance by the American people. It has stimulated a vigorous national debate on the language future of our Nation, reflected in a first round of hearings held last year in the Senate.

A good measure of its growing popularity is its ever shorter, ever more informal designation. The amendment to make English the official language of the United States has become the English language amendment, or simply—the E.L.A. I urge my colleagues to remember that acronym, for they will encounter it often in their constituent mail.

The American people are impatient with us. All around them they see the results of the language policies Congress has imposed, policies that challenge the uniqueness of English in our national life. We have removed the heat from the "melting pot," and the melting seems to have very nearly stopped. Many Americans now feel like strangers in their own neighborhoods, aliens in their own country.

The American people resent the failure of Congress to correct laws that are clearly dysfunctional, and they are letting us know it. Each one of us last November received a letter from Gov. George Deukmejian of California, informing us that the people of his State passed a citizen initiative which directs him to call upon Congress and the President for an end to bilingual ballots. The initiative had been approved last November by 71 percent of Californian voters.

Two States, Indiana and Kentucky, also declared English their official language in 1984. They join three other States—Virginia, Illinois, and Nebraska—that have already taken that step. Ten percent of the States have now declared English their official language, and several more State legislatures are going to do the same in the next 2 years. In Florida, where tensions over language usage run especially high, a citizen initiative drive is underway to make English the language of that State.

Two years ago, our former colleague Sam Hayakawa helped found a new organization to protect the primacy of our common language. That organization, U.S. English, now has over 70,000 paid members.

All this indicates that Americans are deeply concerned about the erosion of English they see all around them, and they want Congress to take affirmative action to protect our language.

For a common language has traditionally united us all as fellow citizens of one Nation, just as surely as separate languages would separate us into unrelated inhabitants of the same territory.

The English language amendment is not intended to bar anyone, citizen or immigrant, from the opportunities to be found in American society. It merely ends the pretense that opportunities are fully open to those who don't learn our language.

The English language amendment is not intended to exclude anyone, citizen or immigrant, from full participation in national life, for the opportunities to learn our language must always be available to those who want to make that effort.

The English language amendment is not intended to regulate language usage between private parties; nor to discourage the teaching of foreign languages as academic subject matter; nor to forgo the use of foreign languages, as expedient, in diplomacy, intelligence gathering, and in other activities related to the conduct of foreign affairs; nor to obstruct the interests of justice.

The English language amendment is intended to end the practice of voting in foreign languages; it is intended to teach children who don't know English through appropriate programs in that language; it is intended to make English the only language for official proceedings of governments at all levels operating in the United States—Federal, State, and local; it is intended to make the acceptance of English a condition of statehood incumbent upon all territories aspiring to that status.

The English language amendment is intended to proclaim a broad principle; English is the language of the United States, and enjoys a special status in this country that sets it apart from all other languages.

I invite my colleagues to join me in working to secure this basic principle in our national charter.

Mr. President, as part of my introductory remarks, I would like to add the eloquent speeches by Senators Hayakawa and Huddleston on the need for this amendment, and have these printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 20

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The English language shall be the official language of the United States.

"SECTION 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.".

ENGLISH LANGUAGE AS THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, language is a powerful tool. A common language can unify; separate languages can fracture and fragment a society. The American "melting pot" has succeeded in creating a vibrant new culture among peoples of many different cultural backgrounds largely because of the widespread use of common language, English.

Learning English has been the primary task of every immigrant group for two centuries. Participation in the common language has rapidly made available to each new group the political and economic benefits of American society. Those who have mastered English have overcome the major hurdle to full participation in our democracy.

A constitutional . . . amendment is needed to clarify the confusing signals we have given in recent years to immigrant groups. For example, the requirements for naturalization as a U.S. citizen say you must be able to "read, write, and speak words in ordinary usage in the English language." And though you must be a citizen to vote, some recent legislation has required bilingual ballots in some areas. This amendment would end that contradictory, logically conflicting, situation.

Bilingual education programs were originally designed to help non-English-speaking children learn English quickly so they could join the mainstream of education and of our society. The Carter administration attempted to substantially broaden this mandate by proposing requirements for schools to teach other academic subjects entirely in students' native language.

I believe that we are being dishonest with linguistic minority groups if we tell them they can take full part in American life without learning the English language. We may wish it were otherwise, but it simply is not so. As the son of an immigrant to an English-speaking country, I know this from personal experience. If I spoke no English, my world would be limited to the Japanese-speaking community, and no matter how talented I was, I could never do business, seek employment, or take part in public affairs outside that community.

Let me explain what the amendment will do, upon its passage by Congress and ratification by three-fourths of the States:

It will establish English as the official language of State, Federal, and local government business;

It will abolish requirements for bilingual election materials;

It will allow transitional instruction in English for non-English-speaking students, but do away with requirements for foreign-language instruction in other academic subjects;

It will end the false promise being made to new immigrants that English is unnecessary for them.

On the other hand, and this is important, there are things the amendments will not do:

It will not prevent the use of any other language within communities, churches, or cultural schools.

That is, Yiddish schools, Hispanic schools, Japanese, and Chinese schools are perfectly all right insofar as their support by local communities, but not by the taxpayer.

It will not prevent the use of second languages for the purpose of public convenience and safety, for example on signs in public places, but it will not allow governments to require multilingual postings or publications.

I am thinking, Mr. President, of such signs as you see in the street sometimes, "Danger, construction area." If this sign is put up in a building lot in Chinatown, let us say, there is certainly no objection whatsoever to putting signs to that effect in Chinese or any other language that is appropriate for the passerby. So, for purposes of public convenience and safety, other languages may be used wherever necessary. I think that what we have, in Washington, Los Angeles, and San Francisco, street signs in Chinese or Japanese, are perfectly acceptable, because they are also accompanied by street signs in English. They are also acceptable because they give a cosmopolitan flavor to those cities that have them and we are proud of the fact that we are a cosmopolitan culture.

My amendment, Mr. President, will not prevent public schools from offering instruction in other languages, nor will it prevent schools and colleges from requiring some study of a foreign language.

Incidentally, Mr. President, we are crippled in international relations because of our imperfect command not only of the wellknown languages like Spanish, French, German, or Italian, but we have very few speakers of Chinese, Japanese, Russian, Hungarian, Arabic, Thai—some languages some people here ought to know so they can serve our Nation intelligently in diplomatic service or in trade. If we have a huge trade deficit vis-a-vis Japan, for example, it is because they have some Japanese salesmen speaking English in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, and elsewhere, but we have very, very few Japanese-speaking Americans doing a selling job in Tokyo or Osaka.

So, at the same time that I declare English to be the official language of the United States, I am not trying to discourage foreign language studies.

The ability to forge unity from diversity makes our society strong. We need all the elements, Germans, Hispanics, Hellenes, Italians, Chinese, all the cultures that make our Nation unique. Unless we have a common basis for communicating and sharing ideas, we all lose. The purpose of this proposal is to insure that American democracy always strives to include in its mainstream everyone who aspires to citizenship, to insure that no one gets locked out by permanent language barriers.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO MAKE ENGLISH THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, the remarks I am about to make will be readily understood by my distinguished colleagues in the Congress. They will be understood by my constituents in Kentucky. They will be understood by the journalists in the press gallery, and by most of their readers across the country.

No simultaneous interpreters will be needed for those in this Chamber, and no translators will be needed for most of those who will be reading these words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The amendment addresses something so basic, so very fundamental to our sense of identity as Americans, that some, who are in full agreement with the objectives of this amendment, will nevertheless question the necessity for it. So widely held is the assumption that English already is our national language, that the notion of stating this in our national charter may seem like restating the obvious. However, I can assure my colleagues that this is not the case and that the need for a constitutional amendment grows stronger every day.

Almost alone among the world's very large and populous nations, the United States enjoys the blessings of one primary language, spoken and understood by most of its citizens. The previously unquestioned acceptance of this language by immigrants from every linguistic and cultural background had enabled us to come together as one people. It has allowed us to discuss our differences, to argue about our problems and to compromise on solutions. It has allowed us to develop a stable and cohesive society that is the envy of many fractured ones, without imposing any strict standards of homogeneity, or even bothering to designate the language, which is ours by custom, as the Nation's official one.

As a nation of immigrants, our great strength has been drawn from our stability to assimilate vast numbers of people from many different cultures and ethnic groups into a nation of people that can work together with cooperation and understanding. This process was often referred to as the melting pot and in the past it has been seen as an almost magical concept that helped to make the United States the greatest nation on Earth.

But for the last 15 years, we have experienced a growing resistance to the acceptance of our historic language, an antagonistic questioning of the melting pot philosophy that has traditionally helped speed newcomers into the American mainstream.

Initially, the demands to make things easier for the newcomers seemed modest enough; and a generous people, appreciative of cultural diversity, was willing to make some allowances. For example, the English language requirements for naturalization were removed for elderly immigrants living here for 20 years who were still unable to meet them; and the use of a child's home language in the school setting was encouraged, in a well-intentioned attempt to soften the pain of adjustment from the home to the English-speaking society that school represents.

However, the demands have sharply escalated, and so has the tone in which they are presented. Bilingual education has gradually lost its role as a transitional way of teaching English, and now mandates a bicultural component. This mandate has been primarily shaped and promoted by the Federal Government. The unfortunate result is that thousands of immigrant and nonimmigrant children are languishing in near-permanent bilingual/bicultural programs, kept in a state of prolonged confusion suspended between two worlds, and not understanding what is expected of them. They and their parents are given false hopes that their cultural traditions can be fully maintained in this country, and that the mastery of English is not so important, after all.

This change in attitude was aptly described by Theordore H. White in his book "America in Search of Itself" wherein he stated:

"Some Hispanics have, however, made a demand never voiced by immigrants before: that the United States, in effect, officially recognize itself as a bicultural, bilingual nation . . . [They] demand that the United States become a bilingual country, with all children entitled to be taught in the language of their heritage, at public expense. No better hymn to the American tradition has ever been written than 'The Education of Hyman Kaplan,' by Leo Rosten, which describes with tears and laughter the efforts of the earlier immigrants . . . to learn the language of the country in which they wished to live. In New York today, forty years later, Hispanic entitlement has created a college, Hostos Community College—supported by public taxes—which is officially bilingual; half its students receive instruction primarily in Spanish, as they strive to escape from the subculture of the Spanish ghetto. Bilingualism is an awkward word—but it has torn apart communities from Canada to Brittany, from Belgium to India. It expresses not a sense of tolerance but a demand for divisions."

This misdirected public policy of bilingualism has been created primarily by the Federal Government, at the insistence of special interest groups, and it continues today because elected officials do not want to run the risk of taking a position that could, in some way, offend these groups. An example of how far this special interest influence reaches can be seen by President Reagan's reveral on the issue. At the beginning of his administration he attempted to kill the bilingual program, now he is embracing the concept.

Over the last few years the Federal Government has spent approximately $1 billion on the bilingual education program and this year alone it cost $139 million. What we have bought with this money is a program that strives to keep separate cultural identities rather than a program that strives to teach English. It is a program which ignores the basic fact that in order to learn another language the student must talk, read and use that language on a regular basis.

The failure of bilingual education programs to teach children how to speak English in the shortest time has been documented by study done at the U.S. Department of Education and by the recent report of the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Federal Elementary and Secondary Education Policy. The latter report stated unequivocally that:

". . . The Task Force recommends that the federal government clearly state that the most important objective of elementary and secondary education in the United States is the development of literacy in the English language . . .

". . . The Task Force recommends that federal funds now going to the bilingual program be used to teach non-English-speaking children how to speak, read, and write English."

Even though the bilingual education program has received failing marks by many reputable educators, it still survives because it is a political issue rather than an educational issue. What this means is that we will continue to finance an expensive bilingual program that does more to preserve cultural identities than it does to teach children to speak English.

In the area of voting rights we have also formulated a national policy that encourages voting citizens not to learn to speak English. The Voting Rights Act, which was reauthorized in 1982, requires bilingual ballots if more than 5 percent of the citizens of voting age in a jurisdiction are members of specified language minority groups and the illiteracy rate is higher than the national rate. As a result bilingual ballots are required by Federal law to be provided in 30 States—even if there is no demand for them.

In essence, we have gone far beyond providing a necessary service on a temporary basis; and, we are now engaged in actively encouraging the use of bilingual ballots, even though in many cases they may not be needed. The wisdom of this policy is clearly lacking when you consider that the vast bulk of political debate, whether it is in the printed press or the electronic media, is conducted in English. By failing to provide a positive incentive for voting citizens to learn English, we are actually denying them full participation in the political process. Instead, we are making them dependent upon a few interpreters or go-betweens for information as to how they should vote. Although this process helps to preserve minority voting blocks, it seriously undercuts the democratic concept that every voting individual should be as fully informed as possible about the issues and the candidates.

In many parts of the country foreign language ballots are under attack. In San Francisco, a local initiative petition has been filed urging that local governments be allowed to print ballots in English only. In that area ballots are now printed in English, Spanish, Chinese and because of the new census figures, Tagalog ballots will probably be printed in the future.

There are other less prominent provisions of Federal law which now require the use of foreign languages. For example, 28 U.S.C. 1827 requires the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S Courts to establish a program for the use of foreign language interpreters in Federal civil and criminal proceedings for parties whose primary language is other than English; 42 U.S.C. 254 requires the use of foreign language personnel in connection with federally funded migrant and community health centers; and 42 U.S.C. 4577 requires the use of foreign language personnel in the alcohol abuse and treatment programs. Although I can understand that this kind of assistance is helpful, the fact that it must be legislated strongly indicates that we are failing miserably in our efforts to teach immigrants and many of our native born how to speak, read and write English.

The Federal laws requiring the use of interpreters and foreign languages are merely the tip of the iceberg. I recently sent a request to all of the State Governors and the major Federal agencies asking for information regarding non-English forms and publications that their offices produce, which are intended for use in this country. Although my staff is still in the process of reviewing the data, and I have not yet received responses to all of my letters, we know that hundreds of different non-English forms and publications are now being printed and distributed on a wide scale throughout the United States. These publications cover a broad spectrum and range from White House press releases in Spanish to National Labor Relations Board notices in 32 different languages. The non-English materials which I have received are in a stack that is about 3 feet high, and we are adding to it almost daily. However, even when all the responses are in we still will not have a complete picture of the use of official, non-English publications. Many of the States are only sending a few samples of what they produce, and I am told that if copies of all bilingual educational materials were sent we could fill a large room. While distribution of these materials may be seen as providing just another government service, it can also be seen as reducing the incentive to learn English and demonstrates a growing nationwide problem.

At the nongovernment level there is a great deal of emphasis being placed on the use of non-English languages. In some major metropolitan areas English is the second language; minorities, who speak only English, are being told that they must learn a foreign language in order to be eligible for a job in parts of this country; and, in many stores non-English languages are the only ones used to conduct business. It is not uncommon to find areas in this country where an individual can live all of his or her life having all of his social, commercial, and intellectual needs met without the use of English.

Statistics show a disconcerting trend away from the common use of English. In 1975 the Bureau of the Census reported that about 8 million people in this country used a language other than English in their households. When the census was conducted in 1980 the number of people who spoke a language other than English at home was found to be over 22 million. Although these numbers are subject to many interpretations, to me they indicate—very strongly—that the melting pot is not working as it once did.

My assumption is confirmed by a recent population bulletin, "U.S. Hispanics; Changing the Face of America," which concluded that because of their common language and large numbers, Hispanics will take longer than other immigrant groups to assimilate into the American society.

If this situation were static and merely a reflection of the large scale legal and illegal immigration the United States has been experiencing over the last few years—in 1980 more immigrants entered the United States than at any time other than the peak years at the turn of the century—there would not be cause for concern. However, what we are seeing is a decrease in the use of English and a widely accepted attitude that it is not necessary to learn English.

There is a new philosophy taking hold, and it is gaining more and more acceptance. In the June 13, 1983, Time magazine an article stated in regard to this new philosophy, that:

"Now, however, a new bilingualism and biculturalism is being promulgated that would deliberately fragment the Nation into separate, unassimilated groups . . . The new metaphor is not the melting pot but the salad bowl, with each element distinct. The biculturalists seek to use public services, particularly schools, not to Americanize the young but to heighten their consciousness of belonging to another heritage."

The United States is presently at a crucial juncture. We can either continue down the same path we have walked for the last 200 years, using the melting pot philosophy to forge a strong and united nation or, we can take the new path that leads in the direction of another Tower of Babel.

There are many nations in the world today that would give a great deal to have the kind of internal social and political stability that a single primary language (English) has afforded us. For us to consciously make the decision to throw away this stablizing force would be seen as foolish and stupid in countries that have paid a high price for not having a universally accepted language.

We have to look no further than the nation which is closest to us geographically and culturally—Canada. They have had a long-running experience with bilingualism and biculturalism, and it is an experience that still generates divisiveness and still threatens to shatter the Nation's unity. The key cause of Canada's internal conflict is language. According to the Annual Report, 1981, of the Commissioner of Official Languages, the total cost so far in implementing the Canadian Official Languages Act "is on the order of $4 billion spread over the 12 years. The question of cost-effectiveness is more problematical. Measured against the goals of relieving English-French tensions and fostering a common pride in the value of our national languages, the results may be more questionable."

Belgium is another nation that has suffered severe internal dissent, much of which has been caused by language differences. In the last 39 years the political coalitions that are necessary to govern that country have been broken apart over 30 times by the fights between the French speaking Walloons and the Dutch speaking Flemish. This political squabbling has had serious consequences for Belgium, and it is not the kind of situation to which any nation should voluntarily subject itself.

This type of political instability has been repeated throughout history, and is still occuring in many countries today. In countless places, differences in language have either caused or contributed significantly to political, social, and economic instability. While the absence of language differences does not guarantee that these problems will not occur, I believe that it does significantly reduce the chances that they will occur.

The constitutional amendment which I am proposing is not unusual, and in fact, many nations have one official language. According to the Library of Congress these include, but are not limited to, Austria, Bulgaria, Denmark, France, the German Democratic Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Romania, and Sweden.

Within the United States there is ample tradition and legislation to justify this approach. According to the Library of Congress:

"Several Federal statutes and numerous State laws do require the use of English in a variety of areas.

"Thus, the Nationality Act of 1940 (8 U.S.C. 423) requires that—

"No person . . . shall be naturalized as a citizen of the United States upon his own petition who cannot demonstrate—

"(1) an understanding of the English language, including an ability to read, write and speak words in ordinary usage in the English language" (with provisos).

"Secondly, 28 U.S.C. 865 requires that in determining whether a person is qualified for jury service, the chief judge of a district court 'shall deem any person qualified to serve on grand and petit juries in the district court unless he (the prospective juror)—

"(2) is unable to read, write, and understand the English language with a degree of proficiency sufficient to fill out satisfactorily the juror qualification form;

"(3) is unable to speak the English language. . . .'

"At the State level, most States have statutes requiring the use of English as the language of instruction in the public schools. Some States also statutorily require English as the language of legal proceedings and legal notices of business regulation, etc."

More recently, the U.S. Senate has spoken out very strongly in favor of establishing English as the official language. On August 13, 1982, Senator Hayakawa introduced an amendment to the Immigration Reform and Control Act declaring that "the English language is the official language of the United States". On a rollcall vote 78 Senators voted for this amendment and it was included in the bill. When this same bill was again reported out of the Judiciary Committee on April 21, 1983 it again contained this language, and the report of the full committee stated:

"If immigration is continued at a high level, yet a substantial portion of these new persons and their descendants do not assimilate into the society, they have the potential to create in America a measure of the same social, political, and economic problems which exist in the countries from which they have chosen to depart. Furthermore, if language and cultural separatism rise above a certain level, the unity and political stability of the nation will—in time—be seriously diminished. Pluralism, within a united American nation, has been the single greatest strength of this country. This unity comes from a common language and a core public culture of certain shared values, beliefs, and customs which make us distinctly 'Americans'."

The concerns that were expressed by the Senate Judiciary Committee are reflected in the concerns of thousands of citizens throughout this country. In fact, a new national organization has recently been created called U.S. English. The honorary chairman of this organization is former U.S. Senator S. I. Hayakawa, who speaks with a great deal of authority on this issue because he is an immigrant and distinguished scholar of semantics and languages.

U.S. English refers to itself as "a national, non-profit, non-partisan organization . . . founded to defend the public interest in the growing debate on bilingualism and biculturalism".

If we continue along the path we now follow, I believe that we will do irreparable damage to the fragile unity that our common language has helped us preserve for over 200 years. Cultural pluralism is an established value in our national life, and one which we greatly cherish. Paradoxically, cultural pluralism can only continue if we retain our common meeting ground; namely, the English language. If we allow this bond to erode, we will no longer enjoy the benefits of cultural diversity, but rather, we will suffer the bitterness of ethnic confrontations and cultural separatism.

The constitutional language I am proposing is simple and straightforward: It would serve to establish a principle that would strengthen us as a nation. However, I am aware that adding to the Constitution takes us into uncharted waters, and that there will be many misleading allegations about the extent of the problem and the proposed remedy. This is one of the reasons I have chosen to propose a constitutional amendment in order to address this issue. It will focus national attention on the problem, and subject it to the type of thorough national debate which is necessary.

During this constitutional process, all parties, sides and interests will have the opportunity to present their respective points of view. This will guarantee that the final version submitted to the States for ratification will accomplish only what is needed to be accomplished and that basic individual rights are not interfered with.

Even though I believe that the constitutional language I am proposing will work, I am open to all recommendations and I will carefully consider any proposed improvements or modifications. However, regardless of the final language, to a large extent it is the legislative history which determines how the language will be interpreted.

Accordingly, it is my intent that the amendment I am proposing would not do a number of things.

First. It would not prohibit or discourage the use of foreign languages and cultures in private contexts, such as in homes, churches, communities, private organizations, commerce, and private schools. The United States is rich in ethnic cultures and they would continue to survive as they have in the past.

Second. It would not prohibit the teaching of foreign languages in the Naion's public schools or colleges nor will it prohibit foreign language requirements in academic institutions.

Third. It will not prevent the use of second langauges for the purpose of public convenience and safety in limited circumstances.

On the other hand the amendment would accomplish a number of objectives.

First. It would bring national recognition to the proposition that a common language is necessary to preserve the basic internal unity that is required for a stable and growing nation.

Second. It would establish English as the official langauge of Federal, State, and local governments throughout the United States.

Third, Since voting by citizens is the method of choosing the representatives of these governments and is the first step in the official process of governing, it would prevent the printing of ballots in foreign languages.

Fourth. It would permit bilingual educatoin where it could be clearly demonstrated that the primary objective and practical result is the teaching of English to studentsf as rapidly as possible, and not cultural maintenance. It would not affect the use of total immersion in English which is proven method of teaching English.

Fifth. It would discourage discrimination and exploitation by making it clear to immigrant parents and children that learning English is indispensible for full participation in the American society and economy and by speeding them into the mainstream of our society and economy as rapidly as possible.

Sixth. It would reaffirm that we are truly "one Nation . . . indivisible . . .".

Mr. President, national unity is not a subject to be taken lightly for without it we would lose much of the strength which sets us apart as a great nation. I believe that history has taught us that one of the vital ingredients for obtaining national unity is a commonly accepted language. This has been conformed by our own past experience in this country, and it has been proven by other countries, that have been divided and weakened by their internal arguments centering around language differences.

National unity does not requre that each person think and act like everyone else. However, it does require that there be some common threads that run throughout our society and hold us together. One of these threads is our common belief and support of a democratic form of government, and the right of every person to fully participate in it. Unfortunately, this right of full participation mean very little if each individual does not posses the means of exercising it. This participation requires the ability to obtain information and to communicate our beliefs and concerns to others. Undoubtedly this process is greatly hindered without the existence of a commonly accepted and used language.

In essence, what a policy of bilingualism/biculturalism does is to segregate minorities from the mainstream of our politics, economy, and society because we are not making it possible for them to freely enter into that mainstream. We are pushing them aside into their own communities, and denying them the tools with which to break out. I have always been against segregation of any kind and by not assuring that every person in this country can speak and understand English we are still practicing segregation. It was wrong when we segregated blacks because of color and it is just as wrong when we create a system which segregates any group of people by language.

As Americans we are a unique people and one of the things that makes us uniquely American is our common language—English. The amendment would assure that anyone in this country can fully take part in the American dream and that future generations also will have this privilege.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from Idaho, Senator SYMMS, in support of a joint resolution which will amend the Constitution to make the English language the official language of the United States.

There is a growing trend in our country, in both public and private policy, to emphasize bilingualism. As a result, we are witnessing a steady erosion in the use of the English language. The resolution introduced today will help put an end to that trend.

Most Americans incorrectly assume that English is the official language of the United States. Although it is the normal language for public discourse and the marketplace, the Federal Government spends in excess of $130 million each year subsidizing the education of non-English-speaking immigrant schoolchildren. Originally, those programs were undertaken with the intention of facilitating the assimilation of immigrants into our culture by beginning educational instruction in their native tongue. Unfortunately, however, bilingual educational is no longer a transitional means of teaching immigrant children. Rather, it has become a practice that promotes the preservation of separate cultural identities while, at the same time, alienating the immigrant from the mainstream of American society.

The constitutional amendment proposed by Senator SYMMS today has been considered by the Senate before. A similar resolution was attached as an amendment to the Immigration Reform Act of 1982, which was passed by the Senate with 78 affirmative votes. The identical resolution was introduced in the 98th Congress by Senator HUDDLESTON. Still, English is not recognized or treated by the U.S. Government as the country's official language. As a result, the newest immigrants to the United States, unlike their predecessors, are not learning in English. For example, over 10 million Americans can speak only Spanish and, if current trends continue, by the year 2030 more than half of California's population will be Spanish-speaking. Similar problems are developing with other, smaller, immigrant groups. We are witnessing a dangerous development in the cultural history of our Nation: the Federal Government is endorsing and supporting the development of a multilingual United States.

Federal and State government agencies spend $138 billion a year on bilingual education. They produce well over 2,000 publications in 32 different languages each year. The policies that make those practices possible are the direct result of special interest groups that attempt to maintain strict ethnic identities through a deemphasis of English.

The erosion of English as the primary language of the United States can be seen in many cities throughout the country. In some major metropolitan areas, English has become a second language. Some cities even publish election ballots in several languages so as to accommodate citizens who cannot read English. The promoters of such policies ignore the facts that non-English-speaking person theoretically could not have passed the naturalization examination, which requires English competency, and that it is difficult for non-English-speaking voters to examine the qualifications of candidates since campaigns and most media coverage use the English language.

The growing problems of illiteracy in English is shown by every census. In 1970, only 8 million Americans spoke a language other than English at home, but by 1980 that figure had increased to 20 million. The current policy of providing vernacular ballots for immigrant Americans provides no incentive to them to learn English. In fact, by condoning Government sponsored bilingualism, the United States is discouraging foreign-born Americans from learning English.

Command of the English language is indisputably a quality that one must possess to become successful in our country. American business is conducted almost exclusively in English. Non-English-speaking tradesmen operate at a severe disadvantage to their English-speaking counterparts. "You'd have to be a damned fool not to realize that English is the official language," noted Hispanic leader Ralph Hurtado, "if you don't speak English, you're a dishwasher."

The bilingual policy of the Government is discriminatory in nature. There is no room for upward mobility in a society if one does not speak the language. Were English to be made the official language of the United States, however, all immigrants, all our citizens, would be stimulated to learn English.

The Department of Education has suggested repeatedly that money now appropriated for bilingual education would be better spent teaching children to speak, read, and write in English. The Department believes that efforts to assimilate immigrant children into American society by teaching them in their native tongues outweighs any attempts to stress the incontrovertible importance of mastering English. Special interest groups use public services such as bilingual education to increase the awareness of their particular heritage rather than to prepare their children for full and successful participation in American society.

Many civil liberty groups are concerned that an amendment to make English the official language of the United States would discriminate against non-English-speaking peoples. Senator SYMMS has provided assurances, however, that Americans will be free to use the languages of their choice, although the advancement of those languages will not be subsidized by the Government.

The English language amendment would neither prohibit nor discourage the use of other languages and the enjoyment of other cultures in private contexts, such as in homes, churches, communities, private organizations, commerce, and private schools, nor would it prohibit the teaching of foreign languages in the Nation's public schools and colleges. Moreover, the amendment would not prevent the use of a second language for public convenience and safety in limited circumstances.

Passage of the amendment would help to preserve the basic internal unity that is required for a stable and growing nation. Most important, it would give national attention to the problem of a language barrier that plagues millions of Americans each year. It would help save local and State governments the millions of dollars that they now spend on bilingual education that duplicates other programs, and allow them to channel those funds into more deserving educational efforts. Since voting by citizens is the method of choosing elected officials at all levels and is the essential first step in our process of democratic government, the amendment would prohibit the printing of ballots in any language other than English.

Adoption of the English language amendment would discourage discrimination and exploitation by making it clear to immigrant parents and children that learning English is indispensable for participating in America's society and economy. It would assist in speeding them into the mainstream of our country's life as rapidly as possible.

America is a nation of immigrants. Our greatness has stemmed from our ability to assimilate vast numbers of people from many different cultures. We have had a common language on which to build our success. It is essential that the Senate pass the English language amendment so that the United States will remain "One Nation * * * indivisible."

I commend Senator SYMMS for his leadership in introducing the resolution, and I urge my colleagues to express their support for this proposed amendment.

Thank you, Mr. President.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S.J. Res. 21. A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the right to life; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT CONCERNING RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President. I rise today to introduce an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the practice of abortion. My amendment states in its substantive part:

SECTION 1. With respect to the right to life, the word "person" as used in this article and in the fifth and fourteenth articles of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States applies to all human beings irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every state of their biological development.

SECTION 2. No unborn person shall be deprived of life by any person: Provided, however, That nothing in this article shall prohibit a law permitting only those medical procedures required to prevent the death of the mother.

Mr. President, I believe that the Constitution of the United States is one of the most important documents in the history of human rights. The rights that it safeguards are fundamental and can only be preserved by maintaining limits on government power, and by insuring that no single branch of government exceeds its authorized powers. The Constitution should not be amended, in the words of the framers, for "light and transient causes." The protection of innocent human life is, however, the right most worthy of inclusion in the Constitution.

Twelve years ago today, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision that I believe was wrong in its substance and in its legal reasoning.

Twelve years ago today, the Court ruled that State laws prohibiting the termination of the life of human beings not yet born were unconstitutional.

Twelve years later, 16 million human lives in the United States have been terminated.

On the first day of the current Congress, my distinguished colleague from New Hampshire, Mr. HUMPHREY, stood before us and gave us a narration of a new film entitled, "The Silent Scream." As you may remember, this film depicts a "real time" ultrasound filming of the abortion of an 11-week-old fetus. We listened as the film's narration explained the abortion procedure and how the fetus was seen trying desperately to escape death within it's mother womb. It left a very sobering impression.

Mr. President, in 1973 we did not have the technology enabling us to look inside a mother's womb to give us a better look as what we all should have known was there, a young human being. Without today's medical knowledge, our Supreme Court handed down a decision that began a slaughter of innocent Americans, unborn.

An argument given before the Court was that with legalized abortion, the rate of child abuse would surely drop, because unwanted pregnancies could be done away with. Instead, since legalized abortion, child abuse has skyrocketed. I believe this to be directly related to abortion's effect on how our Nation values human life. When a nation no longer has respect for the life of the unborn it will not longer have respect for the newborn.

In Roe versus Wade, the Supreme Court first declared that one of the "liberties" constitutionally protected by the 14th amendment against State infringement was the right of privacy which, "encompasses a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." Finding this right of pricacy to be a "fundamental interest," the Court declared that State laws infringing upon this right cannot be sustained unless they are necessary to effectuate a "compelling State interest".

In other words, Mr. President, whether or not the State law that was the subject of the Roe case was a desirable law, it did not offend any specific prohibition of the Constitution. In order to find the State law unconstitutional, a new constitutional prohibition had to be found. So, the Court read the first, third, fourth, fifth, and ninth amendments together, and since some parts of those constitutional protections dealt with aspects of privacy, they, in the Court's view, created a general right of privacy.

Having carved this new and independent fundamental right of privacy out of the stone of six separate constitutional amendments, the Supreme Court in 1973 proceeds to strike down a State law against the procurement of abortion on the authority, not of the Constitution, not of the amendments that made up the Bill of Rights, but under the authority of its 1965 decision in Griswold versus Connecticut that "privacy" was a fundamental right, secured against all but the most "compelling" of State interests, and then concluding that the State did not have a sufficient interest in protecting human beings that were not yet born.

Mr. President, what could be more compelling of "State interests" than the protection of innocent human life? The 14th amendment and the 5th amendment specifically prohibit Federal and State governments from depriving "any person of life * * * without due process of law." The Declaration of Independence states that, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. That they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights. That among these are life * * *" and that "to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men * * * ".

Mr. President, ours is a constitutional Republic, with Democratic institutions. These elected institutions are to make laws to secure the rights promised in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution itself. The courts, which are neither elected nor subject to the popular control of the people, are to interpet the laws made by the elected institutions, and to apply those laws to the specific facts before them.

The legalization of abortion is a practice that Congress would not have done, and that the Supreme Court should not have done. It should not have legalized abortion both because it is questionable whether the Court was authorized to strike down State laws, because State laws prohibiting aboriton did not violate the Constitution, and most importantly, because State laws prohibiting abortion were right.

What our judicial system has failed to correct we must now propose in our hearts to do. We can no longer remain indifferent to the medical proof that an unborn child is a real person—a real human being—with the same inalienable, God given rights as we. The rights to "* * * Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness * * *" As our Nation's lawmakers, we must defend the rights of the helpless—and the unborn. The destiny of our Nation depends on this decision.

Mr. President, I am a farmer. Maybe it is that I have lived all my life in Iowa and worked close to the land that makes be believe what I do. On the farm, we see life day by day. Farmers are not afraid to get a little dirt under their fingernails when they till the soil. The tillage of the soil is a necessary part of growth and respect for nature. I have seen the birth of many a calf and pig as a natural course of daily life. No farmer would dream of aborting a calf. Not only would it hurt the cow, it would break the uniterrupted cycle of life God intended when he put us here. A farmer recognizes that each life, whether it is the offspring of his livestock or of his own family, is a resource of limitless value. Each offspring a God-given resource, that perpetuates and enhances the lives of all creatures.

If we fail to act, future generations will look back in bewilderment, as to how we allowed abortion on demand to continue undaunted, in much the same way we look back now in sadness at how our Nation denied constitutional rights to blacks in the Dred Scott decision, and denied rights to women up to the early part of this century.

Mr. President, we no longer can excuse ourselves from this decision. We must act during this Congress, to end abortion on demand and secure the constitutional rights for all persons, whether born or unborn. I therefore propose this resolution and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 21

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be valid only if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of final passage of this joint resolution:

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. With respect to the right to life, the word 'person' as used in this article and in the fifth and fourteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution of the Untied States applies to all human beings irrespective of age, health, function, or condition of dependency, including their unborn offspring at every stage of their biological development.

"SECTION 2. No unborn person shall be deprived of life by any person: Provided, however, That nothing in this article shall prohibit a law permitting only those medical procedures required to prevent the death of the mother.

S.J. Res. 22. Joint resolution designating March 1985 as "National Mental Retardation Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MENTAL RETARDATION AWARENESS MONTH

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution proclaiming March 1985 as "Mental Retardation Awareness Month." This is the same resolution I introduced at the end of the 98th Session of Congress. Unfortunately, Congress adjourned prior to completing Senate action on this measure. I am hopeful the strong support of my colleagues will ensure quick passage of this resolution in the coming weeks and thus increase the focus on the various campaigns to combat mental retardation.

Mental retardation affects more than 6 million people and constitutes one of the largest single handicapped groups in America. Mental retardation is four times more common than rheumatic heart disease and nine times more prevalent than cerebral palsy. This serious problem affects 15 times as many people as total blindness and 10 times as many children and adults as polio did before research provided the Salk vaccine.

Mental retardation strikes individuals of every race, religion, and nationality, every educational, social, and economic background. It can be caused by genetic irregularities, problems at birth, problems after birth, and environmental factors. But, Mr. President, many instances of mental retardation can be prevented. In fact, recent scientific developments have led some authorities to conclude that 50 percent of the cases of mental retardation could be prevented if current knowledge were fully implemented. Unfortunately, many of the known preventive approaches are not yet in wide use. It is apparent to this Senator that there is an urgent need not only to implement what is already known, but to increase our research efforts and discover means of preventing those many causes of mental retardation for which effective prevention is still unknown.

Mr. President, the joint resolution I am introducing today with my many distinguished colleagues is intended to increase public awareness of this serious problem. For many years now, the month of March has been used by organizations throughout the country to carry on education and fundraising campaigns to assist the campaign against mental retardation. Our resolution continues this important tradition. I urge my colleagues to join in this effort by supporting the resolution.●

S.J. RES. 23. Joint resolution designating 1985 as the "Year of Social Security"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

YEAR OF SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution to declare 1985 "The Year of Social Security," to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Social Security System. I am pleased to be joined by my distinguished friends and colleagues, the majority leader, Senator PACKWOOD, and Senators LEVIN, JOHNSTON, RIEGLE, BOREN, HEINZ, GLENN, BYRD, CHILES, BUMPERS, ROTH, INOUYE, LAUTENBERG, SARBANES, DECONCINI, CRANSTON, MATSUNAGA, SASSER, STEVENS, and PRYOR.

Fifty years ago, on January 17, 1935, Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York introduced the "Economic Security Act," S. 1130, based on recommendations from President Roosevelt's Committee on Economic Security. Seven months later, on August 14, 1935, President Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act, establishing the Nation's basic income security program to protect Americans from "the hazards and vicissitudes of life."

President Roosevelt recognized both the act's historic significance, and the fact it would be but a first step in providing social insurance for Americans. On signing the legislation, he said it "represents a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete."

In five decades since, this program has grown to provide some form of economic security, now or in the future, to 120 million Americans. Today, 25 million retired workers, some 4 million disabled workers, and more than 7 million surviving spouses are receiving Social Security benefits.

The swift passage of the Social Security Act of 1935 did not reflect, or ensure, its universal acceptance. In the first years following 1935, the act was challenged both in the courts and on the campaign trail. The courts, and the people, rallied to the act.

In 1937, the Supreme Court helped constitutionally both the old age benefit and the unemployment compensation features of the act. In Helvering versus Davis, Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo wrote,

> The hope behind this statute is to save men and women from the rigors of the poorhouse as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when journey's end is near.

His words ring true today. Without these benefits, according to Census Bureau data, 14 million more Americans today would be living below the poverty line.

During the 1936 Presidential campaign, the President's opponents characterized Social Security as a "cruel hoax" and "a fraud on the workingman." A rumor campaign warned that workers would be required to wear metal "dog tags" around their necks, and that the Federal Government had plans to catalogue every aspect of every worker's personal life.

Just 10 days before the election—in what, I believe may have been the first direct mail campaign—many workers found in payroll envelopes the following warning:

> You're sentenced to a weekly pay reduction for all your working life. You'll have to serve the sentence unless you help reverse it November 3.

The fears of the 1936 campaign did not prove true, and Social Security quickly became a program supported and endorsed by Americans of all political parties.

The Social Security Act of 1935 provided benefits only for retirees, but eligibility was soon broadened. In 1939, before the first retirement benefit was paid, dependents and survivors were accepted as beneficiaries. Under President Dwight D. Eisenhower, in 1956, disabled workers began receiving Social Security checks. And in 1965, medical insurance for elderly and poor Americans became part of our basic economic security program. Social Security is a success, perhaps the greatest success of the 20th century Congress.

The system has dramatically reduced proverty among the Nation's elderly. In 1937, 3 years before the first check was distributed, two-thirds of all Americans 65 or older had no means of support except help from friends and relatives or private charities. Today, with Social Security, more than 85 percent of all elderly Americans have incomes above the poverty line.

These benefits are secure, the program is depended on; it works. The 1984 Report of the Social Security Trustees found that the benefits provided "under these programs can be paid well into the next century."

I should like to remind my colleagues that the Social Security Act of 1935 contained, in addition to the old-age benefits program and unemployment compensation program, three welfare assistance programs, vocational rehabilitation, and grants to States for Maternal and Child Health and Crippled Children's Services. In 1972, the grants to States for assistance to the needy aged and blind were incorporated into the Supplemental Security Income Program, providing a federally guaranteed income for needy blind, aged, and disabled Americans.

Title IV of the Social Security Act, now known as AFDC—Aid to Families with Dependent Children—continues to provide funds to States for assistance to needy children.

The 50th anniversary of the Social Security Act is a time to celebrate the principles of economic security embodied in the original act.

In so doing, let us reassure all Americans that the system is securely financed and one on which we all can depend.

I urge all my colleagues to join us in commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Social Security Act.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this resolution calling on the President to declare 1985 as the "Year of Social Security." Fifty years ago this month the Economic Security Act was introduced. The legislation was signed into law on August 14, 1935, and the Social Security Program was established. Today, Social Security is the largest domestic program of the Government, dispensing almost $15 billion in benefit payments each month to some 36 million Americans, or 1 out of 7 in the Nation. Over 116 million workers pay Social Security taxes. Total expenditures for the program will exceed $200 billion this year.

Controversial at its inception, Social Security is now considered one of the most successful social programs of Government. Over the years, the program has been expanded to raise payment levels and to include new benefits. Coverage has been enlarged to include survivors and children. Retirement benefits alone were provided by the original Social Security Act of 1935, benefits for dependents and survivors by the 1939 amendments, benefits for the disabled by the 1956 amendments, and benefits for the dependents of disabled workers by the 1958 amendments. The Health Insurance Program, generally known as Medicare, became effective on July 1, 1966.

The most recent major legislation, the Social Security Amendments of 1983, demonstrated the strong bipartisan support that this program enjoys in the Congress and throughout the Nation. My colleagues will recall the serious financial difficulties which faced the Social Security cash benefit programs in the early 1980's. The system moved closer and closer to insolvency as proposals to balance outgo with income were subjected to harsh political attack.

The President responded by establishing a 15 member bipartisan commission to develop proposals for reform. The Congress responded by demonstrating the degree of cooperation and flexibility essential to the enactment of a responsible Social Security financing bill. That bill was signed by the President on April 20, 1983.

As a result of the decisions made by the President and Congress in 1983, taxpayers and beneficiaries alike can feel confidence in the short- and long-term viability of the Social Security System. Because elected officials do not underestimate the importance of the program to workers and to retirees, the sometimes tough steps which are necessary to preserve the system will be taken—now and in the future.

Declaring 1985 as the "Year of Social Security" demonstrates our commitment to this vast program—to the workers who support it and to the beneficiaries who rely upon it each month. We can all be proud of the role the program has played over the years in bringing prosperity and security to millions of our fellow citizens. We must all dedicate ourselves to preserving the system and its financial integrity for many more generations of Americans.

Over the next 50 years the Nation will have to accommodate a very large increase in the proportion of the population that is aged. It is vital that there be greater public understanding of how the system works, in order to encourage broader and more informed discussion of future policies. This anniversary commemoration will help to focus public attention on the program and its role in our society.

Let us join together to celebrate this important milestone—the 50th year of the Social Security Program.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, 50 years ago this coming August 14, a new and vitally important era in this Nation began when President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law the Social Security Act of 1935.

A few years after President Roosevelt signed that legislation, on January 31, 1940, Miss Ida Fuller of Vermont, received the first Social Security payment. Miss Fuller, who lived another 34 years until she died in 1975 at the age of 100, stated that Social Security had enabled her to meet the financial demands of those three and a half decades. It has been so for millions of other Americans.

Since that first payment, according to the historian of the Social Security Administration, well over 100 million Americans have received Social Security benefits.

Today, there is an unfortunate tendency among many, especially those who do not remember the days before the Social Security Act became law, to take this fundamental and important program for granted.

We should never forget, however, what Social Security meant to the people of the 1930's, people who previously had faced the prospect of old age without the dignity and financial security that Social Security provides. Upon signing the Social Security Act, President Roosevelt proclaimed that to millions of Americans Social Security was the fulfillment of "a hope of many years' standing." So proud and pleased was he with the program that he labeled it the "Cornerstone" of the New Deal.

Today, Social Security has become much more than that. It has become a "Cornerstone" of American society. In a study of the history and significance of Social Security, Dr. Wilbur Cohen, former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, has written that "it is no exaggeration to say" that Social Security touches the life of every American citizen.

Social Security currently covers nearly 120 million American workers. The program provides retirement benefits, benefits to totally disabled workers, and benefits to the dependents of deceased workers. It currently is providing benefits to over 36 million of our fellow citizens. It protects 14 million of those from what otherwise would be a life of poverty.

Social Security serves a vital economic function, lending stability to the incomes of the elderly. It is a vital symbol of the compassion of the United States for its senior citizens, for the disabled, and for the dependents of deceased workers. And it is plainly an essential, concrete form of income to all those who depend on it.

Today, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] is introducing a joint resolution to designate 1985 as the "Year of Social Security." I can think of nothing more fitting than to proclaim this 50th anniversary of the program in that manner.

I welcome the opportunity to join as a cosponsor, and commend the Senator from New York for introducing this joint resolution.

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself and Mr. DECONCINI):

S.J. Res. 24. Joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "National Make-A-Wish Month;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MAKE-A-WISH MONTH

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, today Senator DECONCINI and I are introducing a joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "National Make-A-Wish Month."

Our great Nation has been built upon the wishes and dreams of our ancestors, wishes and dreams which have, with time and hard work, been fulfilled. None would question that many of these ambitions, farfetched in their day, began as the wishes of children who, as they matured, worked hard to reach their personal, and collectively national, goals.

Thus it strikes us as a most grievous injustice that every year over 5,000 of our children lose their lives, and their opportunity to fulfill their dreams, to terminal illnesses. Although research institutions are working day and night to discover cures for these devastating diseases, too many children will not benefit from this research.

Fortunately, there is a nationwide, nonprofit organization which is dedicated to granting the wishes of terminally ill children in their compressed lifetimes. The Make-A-Wish Foundation has 40 chapters in 24 States across the country working against time to coordinate, plan, and finance today's wishes of children who may not have a tomorrow. Who can forget the joy of our Nation when in 1926 Babe Ruth hit three home runs for Johnny Sylvester, an 11-year-old who was dying of a spinal infection? It is that heart-warming joy that the Make-A-Wish Foundation seeks to multiply from coast to coast, across geographic and socioeconomic separations, to those in need of at least 1 bright day.

The memories of families who lose children to terminal illness are crowded with images of hospitals, painful treatments, and worries over medical bills. The Make-A-Wish Foundation works to brighten these memories by giving sick youngsters a dream come true and by helping the families share that happiness.

Thanks to the Make-A-Wish Foundation, in December 1983 we were cheered by the sight of 7-year-old Hodgkin's sufferer Amy Benham joining President Reagan to light the national Christmas tree. Living with her family in Weston, WA, Amy has been more fortunate than most, and we hope that her happiness will last for many holiday seasons.

I have been touched by participating in the activities of the Make-A-Wish Foundation in New Jersey. Being able to fulfill the wish of a terminally ill child and to see his happiness despite a long struggle against leukemia has been uniquely moving and fulfilling for me.

To see the smile of a young boy or girl experiencing his or her dream—whether to dance in a ballet, to ride on a fire truck, to watch a Bears game from the bench, or to be a policeman, bat boy, or Senator for a day—is to reaffirm a faith in human kindness.

Because so many of our children face shortened lifetimes and because the Make-A-Wish Foundation has been and will continue to be successful in brightening these youngsters' remaining days, it is appropriate that a resolution focus the Nation's attention on these children, in order that their wishes may be granted while there is time.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 24

Whereas over five-thousand children in the United States die from a terminal illness each year;

Whereas the Make-A-Wish Foundation has established forty chapters in twenty-four States across the country;

Whereas the Make-A-Wish Foundation is a nonprofit organization with a sole purpose of granting the wishes of children who are terminally ill;

Whereas families of such children do not have the luxury of time and frequently are not financially able to provide for a child's fondest wish;

Whereas a wish provides welcome respite during the time of heart-touching turmoil for a family;

Whereas many dedicated individuals and private organizations are working to grant the wishes of such children;

Whereas more contributions will be necessary to sustain the organization; and

Whereas it is appropriate to focus the attention of the Nation upon the wishes of such children in order that such wishes may be granted: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of October 1985 is designated "National Make-A-Wish Month" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all government agencies, educational, philanthropic, scientific, medical, and health care organizations and professionals, and the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

S. CON. RES. 6

Whereas the sanctity of the family, individual liberty, maximum freedom of choice, ownership of private property, and equal treatment of all citizens, regardless of race, are principles which are fully supported by the American people;

Whereas the forced relocation of blacks by the Government of the Republic of South Africa to designated "homelands" divides families, as families are required to remain in the "homelands" while fathers seek work in the so-called "white areas";

Whereas the forced removal of persons living in so-called "black spots" in "white" rural areas in South Africa denies them the fundamental right to live and to farm on land they have legally occupied for years, and subjects them to arbitrary arrest and detention when they seek these rights;

Whereas, compared to "white" South Africa, the designated "homelands," which are meant to accommodate the largest South African population group on a fraction of South African territory and were established without the consent of the vast majority of the governed, are characterized by high rates of infant mortality, unemployment, and malnutrition and by a severe shortage of medical services;

Whereas the policy of the Government of the Republic of South Africa denies blacks their rightful claim to full South African citizenship; and

Whereas the recent violence in South Africa must be seen as an inevitable result of the denial of the full rights of citizenship: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the policy of separate development and the forced relocation of the people of the Government of the Republic of South Africa are inconsistent with fundamental American values and internationally recognized principles of human rights;

(2) the Government of the United States should continue to regard as citizens of South Africa all persons born within the internationally recognized boundaries of the Republic of South Africa, and not differentiate among these citizens on the basis of the South African Government's claim to have granted independence to various "homelands";

(3) at such times that any "homeland" official applies for a visa for travel to the United States, no such visa should be granted to such official unless such official holds a passport which is recognized as valid by the Government of the United States; and

(4) the Government of the United States should urge that the forced relocation of South African citizens be discontinued and that policies be adopted for all South Africa's citizens which protect the sanctity of the family, individual liberty, maximum freedom of choice, ownership of private property, and equal treatment of all citizens, regardless of race.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President with the request that he further transmit such copy to the Ambassador of the Republic of South Africa to the United States and to the Prime Minister of the Republic of South Africa.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I today resubmit a measure which, although agreed to by the Senate last year, did not secure final House approval prior to adjournment. The subject of this concurrent resolution is South Africa's so-called homelands policy. I believe it is vitally important that we in the Congress speak out strongly and with a united voice against this noxious scheme of apartheid; thus, I have reintroduced this resolution today, hoping for expeditious approval by both Houses of the Congress.

The "homelands" policy is an integral part of the scheme known as apartheid. And let there be no mistake over what the purpose of apartheid really is. It is to deny citizenship and basic political rights to the entire black population of South Africa. Apartheid is among the most morally repugnant systems on the face of the Earth and it deserves our unqualified condemnation.

United States policy toward South Africa is deservedly receiving increased scrutiny today. During this session we will undoubtedly be debating at length the merits of "constructive engagement" and several proposed alternatives which would demonstrate concretely our distaste for apartheid and allow us to distance ourselves from the regime which enforces it. Today, however, I am offering a simple proposal on which I trust we can all agree: that the policy of separate development and the forced relocation of South African blacks to designated homelands is inconsistent with fundamental American values and internationally recognized principles of human rights and should cease. We have a responsibility to raise our voices in united protest over this blatant abuse of human rights and I hope my colleagues will join me in cause and conscience to reject and condemn South Africa's homelands policy.

SENATE RESOLUTION 42—RELATING TO THE KEEPING OF CERTAIN TAX RECORDS

Mr. MELCHER submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 42

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that, until such time as the Congress has an opportunity to fully review the provisions of section 274(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as added by the Tax Reform Act of 1984) requiring taxpayers to keep logs and other contemporaneous records regarding the use of certain property, the Secretary of Treasury shall not implement or enforce such provisions.

● Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to make it the sense of the Senate that the Internal Revenue Service should not require the maintenance of automobile mileage and expense logs in order to qualify for investment tax credits or accelerated depreciation for the business use of automobiles and other vehicles under 6,000 pounds, until such time as Congress has an opportunity to fully review these provisions.

The Internal Revenue Service has interpreted the language in the 1984 Tax Act dealing with contemporaneous records to mean that in order to qualify the purchase and use of a car or light truck for Federal income tax writeoffs beginning this year, a business must be able to prove through the maintenance of extensive daily or weekly logs, plus gas and oil receipts, that the vehicle is used half or more of the time for business.

Before these new regulations, the taxpayer could substantiate his or her mileage claims with less rigid evidence, as long as it was sufficient on a case-by-case basis to corroborate the claim of the taxpayer that the vehicle was being used for business purposes. Also, individual IRS agents had more leeway, using their own judgment in evaluating claims.

The new, tougher standards that were put in place January 1, 1985, require daily or at least weekly logs be kept, including auto expenses; the time, place and purpose of each trip, and the relationship of the person using the vehicle to the taxpayer. Failure to keep a log and receipts to prove the business use of the vehicle results in the deductions being automatically disallowed in an audit, with a penalty amounting to 5 percent of the amount the tax payment was lowered.

Farmers, ranchers, and small business people in Montana are outraged at this new burden of redtape. Ranchers have pointed out that in many cases these requirements are just plain confusing and impractical. For example, when a rancher's wife makes a trip to town for family groceries, normally it would be considered a personal use of the vehicle. However, if the trip also includes buying groceries to feed the ranch hands, picking up feed, or bringing home a part for machinery then it could well be considered a business trip.

In other cases, involving small business people, the sheer number of trips each day in the company vehicle makes the keeping of the paperwork involved with these logs a bigger job than the value of the tax writeoff.

In short, this new mileage logging requirement is just one more example where the 1984 Tax Act, or at least, the Internal Revenue Service's interpretation of it, has gone too far in adding more redtape to the already overburdened farmer, rancher, or small business person.

Legislation has been introduced in the Senate to repeal or modify the contemporaneous records language in the 1984 Tax Act. That will probably be done, given the outrage I have seen from most taxpayers, but it will take time for Congress to act on this issue. In the meantime, the Internal Revenue Service is moving ahead with requirements to keep these daily logs. I believe that the Senate should go on record at the earliest possible date in opposition to the IRS requirement to keep these logs. This resolution gives us the opportunity to do that and I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 43—EXPRESSING APPRECIATION TO SENATOR TED STEVENS FOR HIS SERVICE TO THE SENATE AND AS ASSISTANT REPUBLICAN LEADER

Mr. MATTINGLY (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. SIMPSON, and Mr. SYMMS) submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Whereas the end of the Ninety-eighth Congress represented for Senator Ted Stevens the completion of eight years of service as the Assistant Republican Leader, including four years as the Assistant Minority Leader and four years as the Assistant Majority Leader;

Whereas as the Assistant Republican Leader, Ted Stevens was unrelenting in his devotion to principle, unfailingly performed his duties with courage and dedication, and consistently demonstrated the qualities of a true patriot;

Whereas Ted Stevens earned the confidence, admiration and respect of his fellow Senators: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate thanks Senator Ted Stevens for his service as the Assistant Republican Leader and expresses its appreciation for his contributions to the Republican Party and to the United States Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 44—RELATING TO LIMITATIONS OF DEBATE

Mr. FORD submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 44

Resolved, That (a) paragraph 1 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting after the following:

"To lay on the table"

"To adopt an agreement to limit further consideration of the pending business.".

(b) Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"3. (a) At any time after a measure or matter has been pending before the Senate not less than ten hours, it shall be in order for the Majority Leader, with the concurrence of the Minority Leader, to offer a motion to adopt an agreement to limit further consideration of the pending business. Such agreement may cover debate time limitations, amendments, germaneness, and other matters related to final disposition of the pending business. Debate on such motion shall be limited to two hours, equally divided between the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader, or their designees. Adoption of such motion shall require a vote of four-fifths of the members present and voting.

"(b) Upon adoption by the Senate of an agreement to limit further consideration of the pending business, any further consideration of the pending business shall be governed by the terms of the agreement, enforced by the Presiding Officer. Any appeal of a ruling of the Presiding Officer enforcing the terms of the agreement shall require an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting to overturn the ruling.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 45—LIMITING TIME ON THE MOTION TO PROCEED

Mr. FORD submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 45

Resolved, That rule VIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"3. Debate on any motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter, other than an amendment to the rules, made at any time other than the morning hour shall be limited to two hours, to be equally divided between and controlled by the Majority Leader and Minority Leader or their designees, at the conclusion of which, without any intervening action, the Senate shall proceed to vote on the motion.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 46—RELATING TO GERMANENESS OR RELEVANCY OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. FORD submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(1) by inserting after "MOTIONS" in the caption a semicolon and the following: "GERMANENESS"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"6. (a) At any time during the consideration of a bill or resolution, it shall twice be in order during a calendar day to move that no amendment, other than the reported committee amendments, which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution, or to the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall thereafter be in order. The motion shall be privileged and shall be decided after one hour of debate, without any intervening action, to be equally divided and controlled by the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader or their designees.

"(b) If a motion made under subparagraph (a) is agreed to by an affirmative vote of three-fifths of the Senators present and voting, then any floor amendment not already agreed to (except amendments proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution) which is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the bill or resolution, or the subject matter of an amendment proposed by the committee which reported the bill or resolution, shall not be in order.

"(c) When a motion made under subparagraph (a) has been agreed to as provided in subparagraph (b) with respect to a bill or resolution, points of order with respect to questions of germaneness or relevancy of amendments shall be decided without debate, except that the Presiding Officer may entertain debate for his own guidance prior to ruling on the point of order. Appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer on such points of order shall be decided without debate.

"6. Whenever an appeal is taken from a decision of the Presiding Officer holding that an amendment is not germane, or whenever, the Presiding Officer submits the question of germaneness or relevancy of an amendment to the Senate, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer or hold the amendment germane or relevant shall be two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 47—REQUIRING A TWO-THIRDS VOTE ON THE QUESTION OF GERMANENESS

Mr. FORD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration;

S. RES. 47

Resolved, That rule XV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"6. Whenever an appeal is taken from a decision of the Presiding Officer holding that an amendment is not germane, or whenever the Presiding Officer submits the question of germaneness or relevancy of an amendment to the Senate, the vote necessary to overturn the decision of the Presiding Officer or hold the amendment germane or relevant shall be two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.".

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I am submitting today four resolutions proposing changes to the Senate's rules of procedure. Three of the resolutions are only slightly different from resolutions previously introduced by other Senators.

One, however, is essentially a new concept in dealing with the objective of expediting the consideration of bills without unduly reducing the traditional protections and rights accorded minority interests in the Senate. That resolution proposes, in effect, a modification of the practice of operating under unanimous consent agreements.

I have become convinced that strengthening the leadership and the majority in the Senate is the only way to avoid stalemate and obstruction, especially at the end of sessions, and on what we recognize as must legislation—such as debt limit and continuing appropriation resolutions. This resolution shifts the balance of power slightly to the leadership without denying a significant minority group of Senators adequate protection, not only to debate legislation, but to attempt to block it, if their numbers and their determination are sufficient.

Too often we have seen one, two, or just a handful of our colleagues delay or obstruct necessary action at the end of a session. They do this not because they are deeply opposed to the pending business, but because they want to use the leverage of the circumstances to tack on a pet provision of their own. Or they merely want to attract attention to a nongermane, and irrelevant, and highly controversial issue. In any event, the result is total frustration of the responsible efforts of a very substantial majority of the Senate.

The purpose of my resolution to allow limitation agreements to be negotiated by the two leaders, and adopted by a premium four-fifths vote of the Senators present and voting, is to arm the leaders with the power needed to prevent such obstruction and delay.

Requiring unanimous consent for such limitation agreements permits one Member to tie the Senate in almost unremovable knots. By adopting a rule which would require a more substantial minority to prevent reasonable limitations on further consideration of pending bills will release the Senate from this kind of bondage. It will, I hope, enable us to proceed with the Senate's essential business in an orderly and reasonably expeditious manner.

It is my belief that if we adopt such a rule, it will seldom be necessary to use it. Knowing the leadership has this course of action available will make most individual dissenting Senators amenable to regular procedure and reasonable debate. If a limitation agreement does become necessary, it is most likely dissenting Senators will accept the traditional unanimous-consent agreements by which much of the Senate's business is now dispatched.

Making this procedure available only with a massive premium majority vote—80 percent—and much larger than the vote required for cloture, will insure its use only when the conditions are reasonable, fair, and in accord with the wishes of almost all of the Members of the Senate.

The other three resolutions introduced deal with more familiar matter. One would limit debate on a motion to proceed to 2 hours, except on motions to consider amendments to the rules.

The other two resolutions deal with efforts to improve the Senate's ability to insist upon germaneness and relevancy under appropriate conditions. These are similar to recommendations made by the Quayle select committee, and contained in resolutions introduced by the Democratic leader, Senate BYRD, and by Senator STEVENS, and others. The principal difference is that on appeals from rulings by the Chair my proposal requires a premium majority vote of two-thirds to overrule the Chair only when its ruling has been that an amendment is not germane or is not relevant.

Mr. President, I believe the changes proposed in my resolutions are needed. I believe they are reasonable and fair to all. They will not alter the basic balance of power in the Senate between majority and minority, between leaders and individual Senators, and they will not reduce, but rather I believe enhance, the amount of serious and constructive debate and deliberation in the Senate.

The Founding Fathers consciously designed the Senate to be more deliberative and less speedy than the House of Representatives. I believe it is possible to make the Senate more effective without destroying its role as the slower, more deliberative House of Congress. In fact, we will strengthen that concept and that role by making the Senate somewhat more able to do its essential business without excessive delay brought about by a tiny minority of its membership.

The resolutions I am submitting would improve the operation of the Senate making any fundamental change in its character and nature. I hope the Rules Committee will give serious and prompt consideration to them—report them to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will adopt them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, on January 3, I submitted an amendment that added a tax title to S. 51, the Superfund Improvement Act of 1985. Two pages of text were inadvertently dropped from the amendment.

I am today submitting a new amendment which contains the omitted text and is thus merely a corrected version of the amendment introduced earlier.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the corrected amendment be printed.

THE BOMBING ARRESTS

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, on Saturday, January 19, 1985, special agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms arrested three men in connection with the bombing of eight abortion clinics and related facilities in the Washington, DC, Maryland, and Virginia areas. There was a lot of publicity, a lot of priase for the fine investigative work of the men and women who are ATF.

That praise is highly appropriate—the investigation was brilliantly conducted by this very experienced superbly equipped law enforcement agency.

However, such praise is not something that ATF is used to. Although recognized for many years by the Nation's law enforcement community as the premiere bombing and arson investigators in the Federal Government, the public knows little of its skills and its successes. Until the outcry attendant to the clinic bombings, the media has largely chosen to ignore ATF's effectiveness.

In the area of bombing and arson investigation, ATF is the equivalent of a domestic rapid deployment force. With its crack national response teams strategically located throughout the country, ATF is always ready to anticipate or react to such mindless, cowardly crimes of violence.

In 1984, ATF investigated in excess of 1,500 bombing and arson incidents nationwide. In such investigations, ATF enjoys a solution rate far superior to that of any other law enforcement agency in this land.

Nor is ATF's skill limited to explosives crimes. In its other major jurisdictional areas—alcohol excise tax, firearms regulation, and interstate cigarette smuggling, to name a few—ATF is more than just good, it is the best. I urge my colleagues to join me in commending the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

I ask that an editorial praising ATF's efforts be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 22, 1985]

THE BOMBING ARRESTS

They may not be as well known as the FBI or as frequently the subject of myth and movies, but the men and women of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms deserve a lot of credit. They are the explosives experts of the federal law-enforcement agencies, and they have had primary responsibility for solving the abortion-clinic bombing cases. In a little more than two years, they have solved an impressive 20 of the 31 crimes; some of those convicted are already serving prison terms as long as 20 years.

Arrests made over the weekend involve eight bombings in Washington, Maryland and Virginia. The cases were solved not by tips, confessions or informers but by classic and difficult police work. A single fingerprint on a piece of tape used in a bomb and a hair on another were starting points. Bureau agents then traced all local sales of chemicals and carbon dioxide cylinders. They compared handwriting samples on receipts and worked with sales clerks to develop a composite drawing of one of the suspects. Little by little, through hard work and brainpower, they built a case based on physical evidence.

Federal officials have maintained all along that there was no indication of nationwide conspiracy in these cases, and the bureau director, Stephen Higgins, reiterated that position Saturday. Arrests and convictions obtained so far lead to the conclusion that small groups of fanatics in separate geographic areas are responsible for the bombings. Lawyers at the American Civil Liberties Union—whose Washington office was bombed—have expressed agreement with FBI Director William Webster, who refused, on the basis of the evidence, to take over the investigation of these cases and to elevate them to the status of a national conspiracy.

It is always wise to think twice before characterizing crimes as acts of a national terrorist operations, for broad inquiries in politically sensitive areas run the risk of going beyond the specific acts of violence that break the law. The fine work of the bureau in finding particular individuals and charging them with specific crimes is convincing evidence that good criminal investigators don't need broad theories and sweeping powers to find the bombers.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am honored to join with many of my colleagues in the U.S. Senate to pay tribute to the brave Ukrainian people on the occasion of the 67th anniversary of Ukrainian independence. On this day of celebration, I applaud the Ukrainian people in their struggle for freedom, human rights, and national independence.

Although the Ukrainian National Republic endured only 3 years after the January 22, 1918, declaration of freedom, the Ukrainian love of freedom has not been diminished. It is as prevalent in the hearts of Ukrainians today as it was before the Soviet takeover in 1921. Over the past 67 years, the Ukrainian people have suffered almost insurmountable deprivation and degradation, yet the Soviet regime's efforts to deprive the Ukrainian people of their identity, culture, and religious traditions have not extinguished the strong Ukrainian spirit.

Although the hardships endured by the Ukrainian people are many, the Soviet-induced famine of 1932 is one that deserves our attention. The world knows little about this catastrophe, but only one recorded famine has claimed more lives. What makes this famine unique is not its magnitude, but the fact that it resulted from man-made causes.

The Soviet Union, led by Stalin, artificially created this famine to crush the Ukrainian people and break their independent spirit and strong sense of nationalism. The Soviets seized and exported the bulk of the Ukrainian grain crop of 1932-33 and even established border patrols to prevent food from coming into the Ukraine. These actions led to mass starvation which the Soviet Government has taken great pains to conceal. To this day, the Soviet Government continues to deny that this tragedy ever took place. It is my sincere desire that the legislation passed by this body in the closing days of the 98th Congress to create a commission to study this famine will preserve the memory of those who died by giving this forgotten holocaust a secure place in history.

Even today, citizens of the Ukraine are subject to persecution in their quest for freedom and human dignity. All 35 members of the Ukrainian Public Group To Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords have been arrested, deported, or have died in forced labor camps. In an attempt to stamp out religious expression, numerous churches have been destroyed and the clergy operates under constant fear of repression.

Despite the attempts of the Soviet Union to dominate the Ukraine, their national spirit thrives. They are a people who are not willing to submit to their powerful adversary. We, as a Nation, must not forget our struggle for freedom, and on this day of recognition, let us rededicate ourselves to the cause of freedom as we support those who are now speaking out against oppression. I join my colleagues in praising the spirit of the Ukrainian people and speaking out against the deplorable human rights violations inflicted on these courageous people in their quest for freedom and human dignity.●

SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF UKRAINE

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, today marks the 67th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Ukraine. The North Dakota branch of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc. [UCCA] has been very active in working for the freedom of the Ukrainian people. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the North Dakota UCCA marking this occasion.

The letter follows:

DEAR SENATOR ANDREWS, On January 22 Ukrainian people in the free world will celebrate the 67th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Ukraine. This proclamation was made in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, on January 22, 1918.

Following this declaration, the sovereign state of Ukraine struggled for three years against the Russian Bolsheviks. They succumbed to the aggressor who established in Ukraine a communist government known as the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Under the Communist rule, millions of Ukrainians have been annihilated. In 1983, Ukrainians in the free world called attention to the 50th anniversary of the man-made famine which caused the death of seven million Ukrainians. Today, churches in Ukraine are still closed or destroyed, the clergy and faithful presecuted. All aspects of Ukrainian life are controlled and directed by Moscow.

Arrests, trials, convictions of thousands of Ukrainians charged with "anti-Soviet propaganda and agitation", have been made. Unfair trials and harsh sentences have been given to members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Accord Monitoring Groups. Extended prison terms are now being given to anyone who dares to speak.

Ukraine cannot accept cruel foreign domination, Russification of her language and her youth, the dissipation of her culture, destruction of her religion and the annihilation of the country.

Each year in this great country of the United States, from coast to coast, January 22 is proclaimed as Ukrainian Independence Day. It is in the spirit of liberty, faith and justice that America gives moral support to the Ukrainian people.

We thank the President of the United States, members of the United States Congress for their support to the Ukrainian people in their continued struggle of human rights.

Sincerely,

BOHDAN MAKARUK,
President, UCCA State Branch of North Dakota.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, January 22 is an important day. It was on this day, in 1918, that the Ukraine was established as an independent and sovereign nation. Not enough people remember that the Ukraine was once a free state, perhaps because it existed only a few short years before the Soviet takeover in 1922. Nevertheless, the Ukrainian struggle for independence is a story which serves as an inspiration to everyone as a symbol of the ongoing quest for the freedom of all peoples.

Over the 67 years that have elapsed, the Soviet Union has employed large-scale campaigns of repression and persecution in an attempt to crush the spirit of independence within the hearts of the Ukrainian people. They have endured incredible hardships and cruelties ranging from the famine brought about by Soviet farm collectivization, which claimed millions of lives, to the Russification of their schools which now teach their children Marxist/Leninist doctrines. Their churches have been outlawed and their leaders exiled and regularly denounced by the Soviet Government.

It is a credit to the determined will of the Ukrainians that their independence movement has survived. The Ukrainian people's unique culture and traditions spring from an enduring national pride. Ukrainian independence is alive and well within the hearts and minds of all freedom-loving individuals.

Today, Ukrainians who live under Soviet hegemony must struggle to maintain their cultural and political identity. Because of the bravery and dedication of people like the Ukrainians, the cause of human rights will continue to be carried forward. On this day, I am proud to pay special tribute to the men and women of the Ukraine who, at great personal danger and sacrifice, maintain the struggle for freedom and dignity. On this anniversary of the independence of a great nation, our hearts must turn to the hope that one day the Ukrainian people will again be able to celebrate this day in the fullness of their national heritage.●

SIXTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN UKRAINE

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise today to note the 67th Anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence in Ukraine.

Although the Communist overthrow in 1921 sought to extinguish the flame of freedom, that flame still burns in the hearts of all Ukrainians, all Ukrainian Americans, and people everywhere who cherish liberty. Indeed, we must rise to combat infringement of human rights wherever and whenever it occurs. Apathy and silence are friends only to tyranny.

We are proud to again recognize the anniversary of the Ukrainian independence declaration. But at the same time, we are saddened by the present day reality that reflects the very antithesis of such independence. We see discouraging attempts to deprive the Ukrainian people of the last vestiges of their culture and tradition. We see unjustifiably harsh treatment. We see lengthy prison sentences ordered for the mere espousal of the same democratic tenets we hold sacred.

Let us stand today in solidarity with the Ukrainian American Congress and Ukrainians everywhere—their struggle is our struggle. It is a struggle that permeates the globe from the appalling apartheid policies of South Africa to Soviet encroachments in Europe and Asia. We must continue to speak, and whenever possible we must act. History has already revealed the consequences of passivity and silence. The flame of freedom must continue to burn.●

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today we mark the 67th anniversary of one of the most important dates in the modern history of the Ukraine: the declaration of the independent Ukrainian state.

In commemorating this historic event, we express our solidarity with the people of the Ukraine as they continue their courageous protest of Soviet rule and oppression in their country.

From January 22, 1918 until the Russian Communist takeover in 1921, the independent Ukrainian National Republic and its institutions were defended gallantly by its citizens. A central council, which became the center of the Ukrainian liberation movement, was established in Kiev. It organized the Ukrainian National Army, established Ukrainian schools, introduced Ukrainian administrative and judicial systems, and prepared a Ukrainian constituent assembly. By these actions, the council established a full-fledged independent state: the Ukrainian National Republic.

Mr. President, on December 30, 1982, the World Congress of Free Ukrainians submitted to the Secretary General of the United Nations, His Excellency Javier Perez de Cuellar, a "Memorandum" which outlined the history of the Ukrainian people under Soviet Russian occupation. Atrocities committed by the Soviets against the Ukrainians include:

Genocide, or the physical destruction of millions of Ukrainians through the enforced process of collectivization (1921-1931); man-made famine (1921-1933); indiscriminate executions of both Communist and non-Communist Ukrainians in the 1930s, and the willful and deliberate killings of members of the Ukrainian underground resistance movement in the 1940s and their families;

Ethnocide, through the systematic russification of the Ukrainian language and educational system, and obliteration of the Ukrainian national identity;

Suppression of Ukrainian culture and distortion of Ukrainian history and literature;

"Liquidation" of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church (1937-1938) and the Ukrainian Catholic Church (1945-1946) through arrests, deportations and executions of their hierarchs, thousands of priests, monks and nuns and church lay leaders, and through confiscation of church properties and the closing down of the church as an established organization;

Economic exploitation of Ukraine's natural resouces for the utilization of Moscow's totalitarian expansion and aggrandizement;

Destruction of the political structure (political parties, blocs and coalitions) of the Ukrainian people;

Violations of national and human rights on a gigantic scale.

As with all of the world's "captive nations," Ukraine, one of the first victims of Soviet Russian imperialism, continues to endure Soviet efforts to eliminate its national identity, culture and religious traditions.

Although the independent republic survived only 3 years, the Ukrainian spirit of freedom has not been quenched. Today, it is as alive in the hearts of Ukrainians as it was in 1918.

In honoring the memory of those who fought to establish and defend the independent republic of the Ukraine, let us recommit ourselves to speaking out in solidarity with those who continue to fight for the human rights of the Ukrainian people. And, to those enduring unjust punishment for their promotion of human rights and the principles of democracy and freedom, we renew our pledge to seek Soviet compliance with international treaty commitments to honor the human rights of all people.●

IRS WAIVES PENALTIES FOR SOCIAL SECURITY AND RAILROAD RETIREES

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, on January 15, I circulated a letter to all Members of the Senate expressing my intention to introduce legislation early this week which would provide a one-time waiver for taxable year 1984 penalties, and the interest on penalties, associated with an individual's underpayment of estimated tax as the result of the newly imposed Social Security and Tier I Railroad Retirement benefit taxation provisions. This legislation represented a change in tax policy which was urgently needed to protect Social Security and railroad retirement beneficiaries throughout the Nation.

As part of the Social Security Financing Amendments of 1983, a provision was included which requires that a portion of Social Security and Tier I Railroad Retirement benefits be included in taxable income for taxpayers whose adjusted gross incomes, combined with 50 percent of their benefits, exceeds a base amount of $25,000 ($32,000 for couples). This provision caused a great deal of controversy, and continues to cause a great deal of confusion among Social Security and railroad retirement beneficiaries. The problems associated with the provision have been made even more pronounced by the fact that prior to this month—a full 20 months after enactment of the legislation—the Social Security Administration did not officially alert all beneficiaries to their potential tax liability. It is my belief that many senior Americans, through no fault of their own, will be found to have underpaid the estimated taxes and would therefore be subject to penalties on the underpayment.

Early last week, officials at the Internal Revenue Service stated they had no authority to grant a waiver on the penalties associated with an individual's underpayment of estimated tax as the result of the newly imposed taxation provisions. However, late last Wednesday, the Internal Revenue Service issued a news release which represented a change in that policy. I am pleased that the Service has announced that it will not assess estimated tax penalties in the case of any estimated tax underpayment attributable to taxable Social Security benefits. Therefore, Mr. President, the legislation I had planned to introduce will no longer be necessary.

I thank my many colleagues who have expressed strong support for the legislation I had planned to introduce and express my great pleasure at the recent IRS announcement. I ask that the text of the IRS news release on the subject be printed in the RECORD.

The release follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY, INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, DC, January 16, 1985.

NEWS RELEASE

WASHINGTON.—The Internal Revenue Service today announced that in the case of any estimated tax underpayment attributable to taxable social security benefits, it will not assess estimated tax penalties.

Generally, taxpayers with income not subject to income tax withholding are required to pay their tax in quarterly installments. Taxpayers who fail to make the required quarterly payments are assessed a penalty.

A provision of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 gives the IRS authority to waive the underpayment penalty under certain limited circumstances. Since 1984 is the first year for taxing social security benefits and many recipients were unaware that the taxable portion had to be considered in making estimated tax payments, the IRS has determined that imposing the penalty would not be appropriate under these circumstances.

However, the IRS emphasized that the penalty will be assessed for taxpayers that failed to make the required estimated tax payments on other sources of income.

Tier 1 railroad retirement benefits will be treated in the same manner as Social Security benefits.●

THE ACID RAIN CONTROL ACT OF 1985

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 52, the Acid Rain Control Act of 1985, and I commend my distinguished colleague, Senator STAFFORD, chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, for his leadership on this issue.

Acid rain is a growing concern in the State of New York, not only for its detrimental effects on aquatic chemistry and life, but also for the increasing appearance of problems with our forests, crops, and even our drinking water.

As I regularly visit the beautiful Adirondack region, I have been particularly concerned over the damage in that area. As a rule, the Adirondack lakes do not have enough natural buffering capacity to neutralize the detrimental effects of acid rain. The combined effect of the damage to the forests and the loss of sport fisheries has cost the region millions of dollars in lost tourism.

Although scientists speak in cautious words, it is clear that acid rain is a growing disaster. It has even scarred the Statue of Liberty.

Mr. President, I do not believe, as some would propose, that we should simply study this problem over and over before taking action. Without prompt action, this problem will grow. A lake can take only so much acid; after a point, it may lose its fish and plant life forever. Some of our lakes have passed that point, while others are drawing dangerously close. Once acid rain has laid waste to a forest, it takes decades for the trees to grow back.

Worse yet, acid rain may do harm we are only starting to understand. If enough acid gets into a reservoir, it might release aluminum and mercury from the bottom, with serious implications for our drinking water supplies. Acid might also leak lead from the pipes in water delivery systems. The health effects are still unknown, but the possibilities are disturbing.

The single greatest source of acid precipitation is believed to be sulfur in coal burned by electric utilities. Nationally, emissions of sulfur dioxide are running at about 25 million tons per year.

S. 52 would require sulfur dioxide emissions to be reduced by 10 million tons per year by 1994. For this reason, I support S. 52. However, I do so with one reservation. S. 52 contains a provision establishing a study on the feasibility of a system of fees on the generation of electrical energy to finance the proposed emissions reductions. I believe that any fees to finance these reductions should be based on the level of emissions, not the level of production. The message is simple: We have to cut down on the air pollution that causes acid rain—and we have to make the polluters pay. I urge the Committee on Environment and Public Works to include in S. 52 a study of alternative methods of financing these reductions.

The citizens of New York are extremely concerned about acid rain. The overwhelming majority of New Yorkers who have contacted me on this issue have indicated that they support strong acid rain legislation—even if it means slightly higher utility bills. They do not want to see Congress delay action through more hearings. They do not want to see Congress delay action through more discussions. They do not want to see us authorize more studies which do nothing to actually accomplish a reduction in emissions. They want a solid, strong acid rain control program, and they want it now.●

POVERTY AND WELFARE

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, recently, the CATO Institute held a policy forum at its Washington headquarters which featured Charles Murray as speaker. Mr. Murray remarked on current Federal policy concerning the poor and disadvantaged in this country. In his discussion of our social policy, and in greater depth in his recent book entitled "Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950-1980," Mr. Murray offers new ways in which to think about resolving the problems of poverty and welfare transfers which face our country today. I believe Mr. Murray's remarks are very timely and of great import as we begin our consideration of the fiscal year 1986 budget. It is my great hope that his remarks will be read carefully by my colleagues and given serious consideration.

I ask that these remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow.

POVERTY AND WELFARE: ARE WE LOSING GROUND?

(Every month the Cato Institute sponsors a Policy Forum at its Washington headquarters where distinguished analysts discuss their views with an audience drawn from government, the public policy community, and the media. A recent forum featured Charles Murray, a senior fellow of the Manhattan Institute and author of Losing Ground: American Social Policy, 1950-1980 (Basic Books, 1984). Following is the edited text of Mr. Murray's remarks.)

One of my main goals in writing Losing Ground was to find a common language in which conservatives and liberals who like to think about ideas can communicate about issues and social justice. As far as I'm concerned, liberals are just about the only political group with which libertarians can communicate these days about ideas. The political center, both of Democrats and Republicans—and I include the administration—is pretty much intellectually bankrupt.

Some of the issues that concern the situation of the poor and disadvantaged in this country are in many ways more muddled now than they were in 1964. There seems to be a general notion that if we get rid of welfare cheats and have enough economic growth, all the problems will take care of themselves. I just don't think that's true. Unless people who are interested in ideas and who come from both ends of the political spectrum can communicate with each other, we will continue to pay off the poor and the blacks as we have been doing for the last several years, hoping that they will stay sufficiently far in the background for us not to have to worry about them.

But it is all too easy for liberals and libertarians not to understand each other. If I, as a person with a strong libertarian streak, say that I think it isn't right that the government take part of my income to pay for food stamps, then there is really nothing for us to discuss. First of all, my liberal friend will assume that (whatever I may say) I am probably more concerned about the tax bite than I am about the issue of social justice. Even if I do convince him that food stamps are a moral issue to me, I will not have posed a substantive issue to him. In his view the notion that food stamps are wrong, not just inefficient or expensive, is nonsense.

Let us ignore, then, for present purposes, the merits of transfers from the "haves" to the "have nots." Let us ignore food stamps and medicaid, and other things that represent transfers from those who pay more taxes on behalf of people who have less. Instead, let's consider the following proposition: A central feature of social policy for the last 20 years has consisted not of tranfers from the haves to the have nots; rather, the lawmakers and courts have mandated transfers from poor to poor. The transfer are mandated by the better off, but the price must be paid by donors just as poor as the recipients.

Let's start by considering inner-city schools in which all the students are black. The 1960s saw enormous reforms in education motivated by the perception that injustices were being done to some students in these schools. The story I am about to tell addresses one of these reforms.

Let us say that I observe two students, both poor, both disadvantaged. One is studying hard, and the other makes trouble and gets thrown out of class. The bad student is eventually expelled from school, becomes delinquent, and ends up in prison. Let us also say that the sequence of events can be traced to the fact that he was originally kicked out of class. As a sensitive, socially conscientious observer I argue, as was argued from the mid-1960s, that this is grossly unfair. Had the student been white he might have gotten thrown out of school, but parental and school pressures probably would have gotten him back in or straightened out. If things got bad enough and his parents had enough money, he would have been sent to military school or some other middle-class surrogate for reform school.

Further, we know that the behavior of the teacher toward these students is unfair and biased because the teacher is a white surburbanite. He or she doesn't sympathize with or understand black culture. To remedy the unfairness in the interest of greater social justice, I have policies enacted that severely limit the discretion of the teacher to expel the bad student from class. (I am referring to the very strict rules imposed in the wake of Gault v. Arizona in 1967 which not only restricted what teachers and school administrators could do, but made them quite vulnerable to lawsuits and other professional danger if they transgressed their limits.) The result, not unnaturally, is that the bad student continues to misbehave in the classroom. Other students who perceive his greater latitude join him. In general, a lot less teaching goes on and the standards of performance that the teacher can try to enforce diminish.

I also observe other unfortunate situations in the schools. The worst students are disheartened by failure: telling them "you have failed" makes them give up. Tests, it is said, discriminate in favor of people with certain intellectual skills because those tests are culturally biased. Therefore, to remedy the injustice, I forbid the use of standardized tests. I forbid failure, or at least the acknowledgment of failure, on behalf of the unsuccessful student.

Some benefits are obtained by these measures. More kids stay in school and get a diploma, for what it's worth. But someone—and it is not the child of the white and affluent—has paid a price. The price has been exacted from the poor, black student who tried to study hard. One poor and disadvantaged student was compelled to give up part of the good called education so that another student could stay in the classroom. The parents of the good student, who are likely to be responsible to some extent for the fact that their child wanted to study hard, have been required to give up part of their ambitions for that child. But they did not have the option of putting their youngster in a private school. In our concern over the deterioration of education in suburban schools, we overlook the enormous extent to which the more affluent middle-class whites, unlike poor blacks in the inner city, have been able to compensate for deficiencies in public education.

Let me take another example—criminal justice. Beginning the mid-1960s there was a widespread revulsion against punishment and incarceration which had dramatic effects on the treatment of offenders on all levels of the criminal justice system. The case of juvenile delinquents is typical. In Cook County (Chicago) in 1966 there were 1,200 youngsters who were institutionalized. By 1976 that number had dropped to 400—a drop of two-thirds during a period that saw juvenile crime in Chicago mushroom. As of the mid-1970s the average number of arrests for a youngster committed for the first time to an institution was 13.6. Now, imagine what you would have thought in high school had someone told you that you had to get arrested an average of 13 times before being sent to reform school.

The purpose for the shift to deinstitutionalization was, again, greater social justice. Those kids were committing crimes in part because society had played a dirty trick on them. Also, it was decided on the basis of no empirical evidence worth mentioning that reform schools only made kids worse; they were schools for crime. Therefore, on behalf of the disadvantaged youngsters, we quit putting them in institutions.

The people who promoted such policies very seldom lived in the neighborhoods where the delinquents were committing their crimes. Policymakers again exacted a transfer from poor to poor. This time it was a transfer of the good called safety from the elderly woman who had to get back to her apartment from the mailbox to the youngster who was being freed from the injustice of punishment.

Let us consider a third example. One of the major goals of the poverty warriors was to strip welfare of its stigma. The emissaries that were dispatched to the inner city by the intelligentsia bore the message that it was the system's, not the recipient's, fault that assistance was needed. There was no reason to feel guilty. Frances Fox Piven and Richard A. Cloward cite evidence in their interesting and worthwhile book, Regulating the Poor, that the poverty warriors met with some success.

James Patterson, a Brown historian who recently wrote a history of the struggle against poverty, has a wonderful passage summarizing the elite wisdom about getting rid of the welfare stigma and its effects. Asking why the number of AFDC recipients in the late 1960s virtually exploded, he answers, "The source of this explosiion, most obvious to contemporaries, was changing attitudes of poor people themselves. Despite the hostility of the middle classes to increases in welfare, poor Americans refused at last to be cowed from applying for aid. Despite the continuing stigma attached to living on welfare [by the middle classes], they stood firm in their determination to stay on the rolls as long as they were in need. Welfare was not a privilege, it was a right. Compared to the past when poor people, harassed and stigmatized by public authorities, were slow to claim their rights, this was a fundamental change."

This is all very well, but put yourself in the position of a father in the inner city who works at a menial and low-paying job. He has done so, doggedly, for most of his life and is proud to have supported himself and raised a family without help. Many of our parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents felt exactly the same way. Historically, the community in which this man grew up had had an elaborate status structure. All poor people were not alike—in fact, there were drastic differences among them. A basic status distinction was made between poor people who pulled their weight and managed to raise their families, and those who did not. A person might be out of a job sometimes; that was expected. But one who was chronically unemployed—who couldn't hold a job at all, who neglected spouse and family—was consigned to a different circle of status. He was a bum, a no-good. People who supported themselves were "better" than people who did not.

Then came the eminent representatives from beyond the local community and from the government who pinned the blame on the system, and after a while the traditional moral distinctions eroded. In many ways it no longer made sense to hang on to a poor, low-paying job; and to that extent the status associated with it diminished. Status accrues to things that are functional for a community, and loss of status accrues to things that are dysfunctional. Income maintenance transfers make dependence less dysfunctional for the local community, and hence reduce the stigma of welfare among those people who receive it.

The reversal of values has gone much further than I can prove statistically. I suggest you go to an inner-city neighborhood and ask the young people standing on the corner what they think of their contemporaries or, for that matter, of older members of the community who work steadily at some low-paying job. I suggest you ask school teachers what they hear and observe of youngsters' attitudes toward people who reject opportunities to put together a "package" of welfare benefits, occasional work, and the underground economy. Ask who the local heroes are. You will then get some sense for how much the world has flipped upside down for young people living in the most disadvantaged communities. The black inner city is only the most dramatic example of a phenomenon that can be observed in any community of people who are disadvantaged, homogenized, and isolated. Most of the data on black versus white is, I would contend, a proxy measure of distinctions of poor versus not-poor.

I would like to make a distinction between what I'm actually saying and what I'm sometimes understood to say. Here I am not talking primarily about the need to change the system for the sake of the younger generation. Rather, I am asking you simply to think about that hypothetical middle-aged man who is acting in a way that every one of us considers not only admirable, but in some respects heroic. We have exacted an enormous price from that man. In return, he may be getting some of the welfare money we have appropriated. I hope that that money makes a positive difference in his quality of life, for there is certainly a lot to compensate for with regard to deteriorations in his quality of life.

In this context, let me very gingerly suggest one thing that can be done now to work toward a solution to the problems I have raised. The first step is to avoid topics on which significant changes is impossible. I think consensus making on reforms of social policy is a little bit like arms negotiations. What we really want to do is to get rid of all the ICBMs, but since we can't talk about that, we try to modify the throw-weight. In our case, it may be that I would like to scrap the entire income maintenance system. But that's not going to happen. It is, after all, a system that went into a paroxysm of anxiety a couple of years ago, a bipartisan agony—to achieve what? A six-month delay in the cost-of-living increase in social security. Serious reform of income maintenance is not in the cards.

To make headway, therefore, we should focus on noneconomic transfers like education and crime in which the transfer is almost exclusively from one poor person to another—a transfer that we who are not poor have exacted from those who are poor. If we keep the discussion on this level, we might be able to reach a consensus about some injustices we have been perpetrating in the name of compassion, and perhaps make some progress.

The tragedy of welfare policy is played out especially in the lives of kids in their teens and early twenties. I'm not talking only about black inner-city kids, but kids from small towns in places like Iowa. At that time in one's life, one tends to think in terms of very short time frames. It's precisely at that age when the incentives we put into the system in the mid-1960s have their most potent effects. If I were able to make only one of my proposed changes in the welfare system, I would make it just about impossible for a youngster aged 15 to 25 to get any kind of welfare assistance. By changing the rules of the game—and tampering with incentives—we are just passing our problems on to the next generation.

Finally, allow me to convey my image of the great tragedy we are observing. The tragedy of our current policy is not so much the youngster on the street corner not working when he could be holding down a job on the loading dock. The real tragedy is the child who should be a physicist, a surgeon, or a business person—escaping from the ghetto permanently, not rising up to the next quintile of income and then dropping back to welfare. People who are getting out of the system are not getting out as much as they should be. They stopped getting out. All the innovations of the huge, expensive programs of the mid-sixties and early seventies failed. Inexplicably, these programs failed to touch a population of youngsters who shouldn't be just getting by, but should be skyrocketing up. We saw this happen. I would like to lift the almost impermeable cap we seem to have put on these children and their communities.●

AUTOMOBILE LOGS

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, sometimes I reflect upon the acts of tyranny that must have caused the Boston Tea Party in 1773. I suppose that the people of our Nation in that day were driven to a point by the demands of the British Government that they had no other choice than revolution. Since that revolution, we have become a great nation which prides itself on its freedom and the resourcefulness of its people. We have, however, fallen prey to some of the same abuses of authority which prompted the revolution which created this Nation. I believe very strongly that we have required more and more of our citizens simply to keep our Government in operation. An issue which has arisen as one of the most oppressive demands to place upon a free individual is the new requirement to have persons record every activity in connection with their business use of automobiles with a daily log.

Because of the ongoing complications I see with regard to this new rule, I shall propose legislation to do away with this requirement. The legislation, which I shall introduce along with several other colleagues, would return the rules in connection with the substantiation of automobile use to the pre-1985 requirements.

This new rule, while trying to curb abuse of deductions for automobile expenses, places an incredible burden upon the taxpayer. We live in a society which requires many daily tasks to be performed in connection with our business and personal lives. We cannot impose such an onerous task upon an already overregulated Nation. This simply is not the best way to monitor tax compliance among the taxpayers of America.

Prior to 1985, you simply had to have adequate records to substantiate the business use of your automobile. Under the new rule, you must keep a record at the time you use the automobile which includes the driver's name, the business purpose of the trip, the miles driven, and the date driven. The worst part about this idea is that it hits the small businessman and farmer the hardest. These are the ones who are already hard pressed to do the work simply to keep their businesses afloat.

Since the inception of the income tax, our Nation has had outstanding success with voluntary compliance of our income tax system. This is based upon a basic trust of the government with the people of our country. When this trust is violated by the impostition of a requirement on the taxpayer to keep an account of his daily activity and whereabouts, we have started down that dismal road of tyranny and revolt.

I ask my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, once again I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of recently introduced legislation to limit the manufacture and importation of armor-piercing ammunition, also known as "cop-killer bullets." S. 104 is necessary to ensure the continued effectiveness of the protective vests worn by Presidents, half of our Nation's 570,000 sworn police officers, and other public officials.

This bill is identical to the bill as introduced in the 98th Congress (S. 2766). It is carefully crafted, and has been carefully reviewed. I am proud to have contributed to the drafting and negotiation process that preceded its introduction last June.

S. 104 continues to permit the manufacture and importation of armor-piercing ammunition for the use of Government agencies, particularly law enforcement agencies. It also permits armor-piercing ammunition to be manufactured for exportation.

Manufacturers and importers are not permitted under this bill to sell armor-piercing ammunition to licensed dealers. S. 104 also requires manufacturers and importers of armor-piercing ammunition to pay a license fee of $1,000 per year.

The term "armor-piercing ammunition" means solid projectiles or projectile cores constructed from tungsten alloys, steel, iron, brass, bronze, beryllium copper, or depleted uranium. Projectiles that the Secretary of the Treasury finds to be primarily intended to be used for sporting purposes are specifically excluded.

The penalty provisions this bill provides for are most important. Although similar penalties were enacted as part of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act—Public Law 98-473, signed into law October 12, 1984, such penalties will be more effective when linked to this bill's superior definitional section.

Section 6 imposes a mandatory prison sentence of not less than 5 years for an individual who, during and in relation to the commission of a violent felony, uses or carries a firearm and is in possession of armor-piercing ammunition capable of being fired in that firearm. This sentence shall be in addition to the punishment provided for the commission of such felony.

I urge my colleagues to join as cosponsors of S. 104. This legislation strikes a careful balance between the need to maintain the effectiveness of the vests that have saved the lives of more than 400 police officers and the use of firearms for sporting and other legitimate purposes.●

MACK McLARTY

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, recently my long-time friend, Mack McLarty, was elected chairman and chief executive officer of Arkla, Inc. Arkla is a five-State integrated gas corporation serving areas in the States of Arkansas, Lousiana, Kansas, Texas, and Oklahoma.

Mack McLarty is one of our State's outstanding citizens. And he is a friend of mine from way back. His notable civic achievements include serving as a member of the Board of Visitors at the University of Arkansas at Little Rock. He is a former president of the Great Little Rock Chamber of Commerce and past chairman of the United Negro College fund-raising campaign. He has been a member of the Board of Trustees of Hendrix College in Conway, AK.

In addition to these and many other community activities, Mack has been a leader in introducing computers as teaching tools in the public schools of Arkansas. He was instrumental in raising over $250,000 in private contributions for this pilot project and has been an avid and strong supporter of public education. Mack is a leading proponent of increased public-private cooperation.

Mack McLarty is a fifth-generation native of Hempstead County in southwest Arkansas. And he belongs to a family that has always been active in civic affairs. In 1970, he ran successfully for the Arkansas Legislature. He was 23 years old at the time and won with 74 percent of the vote, carrying every box in the county. When he went to the general assembly he became the second youngest person ever to be elected to the Arkansas Legislature. When he came to the end of his term in the legislature, he decided to concentrate on business rather than government, and he gave up what promised to be a long and distinguished career in politics.

Our families have been friends for many years, Mr. President. Both were involved in the automobile business in south Arkansas. Mack's late father, Frank McLarty, of Hope, AR, was one of the finest men I have ever known. And his mother, Helen, is one of my favorite people. In fact, I had the pleasure of appointing her to the industrial development commission during my second term as Governor of Arkansas.

In addition to Mack's term in the Arkansas House of Representatives, he was also chairman of the Arkansas Democratic Party and served as treasurer of my campaign when I was elected Governor in 1974.

Mr. President, please join me in congratulating Mack, his wife Donna Kay, and their two fine sons, Mark and Franklin. He has made a lasting contribution to Arkla, and I join his family in sending best wishes on this occasion.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION—PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. POLICY JUSTIFICATION

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—STANDARD MISSILES

The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) has requested the purchase of a quantity of 110 SM-1 Standard missiles (55 less warheads) with 70 MK 372 containers, 5 AN/DKT-27C exercise heads, 5 AN/DKT-36 dorsal fin assemblies, and Standard missile spares at an estimated cost of $44 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of the FRG; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The Standard missiles being provided in this case are a later version of the Standard missile and will upgrade the FRG's capability against air and surface threats.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the General Dynamics Corporation of Pomona, California.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.G. Government personnel or contractor representatives to Germany.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

GERMANY—8-INCH PROJECTILES

The Government of Germany has requested the purchase of a quantity of 30,000 M509A1, ICM, HE, 8-Inch Projectiles and related publications at an estimated cost of $35 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Germany; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The sale of this ammunition would increase the effectiveness of the German Army (Bundeswehr) artillery because it would modernize and upgrade its ammunition stocks. The M509A1 Projectile is a second generation ICM round developed to replace the older, single purpose M404-ICM Projectiles. This M509A1 Projectile provides a dual-purpose capability as it is designed to engage light armor as well as personnel targets at longer range.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The ammunition will be manufactured at the Lone Star Army Ammunition Plant of Texarkana, Texas.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel or contractor representatives to Germany.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—PATRIOT AIR DEFENSE MISSILE SYSTEMS

The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) has requested the purchase of twelve fire units, one training fire unit and one maintenance float fire unit consisting of a quantity of 779 Patriot Guided Missiles, 14 Radars and 14 Engagement Control Stations, 100 Launcher Stations, associated operations and maintenance support equipment, repair parts, and support services at an estimated cost of $1,149 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of the FRG; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

The FRG requires the Patriot Guided Missile System to modernize its aging air defense capability. The Patriot System will be used to defend Central European airspace and it will contribute to the integrated air defense network within NATO. The FRG is capable of absorbing the Patriot into its defense establishment and will result in a marked improvement in its air defense capabilities.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the Raytheon Company of Lexington, Massachusetts.

Implementation of this sale will probably require the assignment of additional U.S. Government and contractor representatives to the FRG; however, the number of personnel and the period during which they will be needed is not known at this time.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 15 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of a proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is available to the full Senate, I insert in the RECORD a notification which has been received.

The notification follows:

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

TURKEY—COOPERATIVE LOGISTICS SUPPLY SUPPORT

The Government of Turkey has requested the purchase of cooperative logistics supply support (FMSO II) for follow-on spares and supplies in support of C-130H, F-4E, F/RF-5A, F-100C/D/F, RF/F-104G, T-33, T-37C, and T-38 aircraft and other systems and subsystems of U.S. manufacture at an estimated cost of $88 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Turkey in fulfillment of its NATO obligations; furthering NATO rationalization, standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defenses of the Western Alliance.

Turkey needs this logistics support system to maintain the readiness of the Turkish Air Force weapon systems of U.S. origin. The cooperative logistics support will be provided in accordance with and subject to the limitations on use and transfer provided for under the Arms Export Control Act as embodied in the terms of sale. This sale will not adversely affect either the military balance in the region or U.S. efforts to encourage a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus question.

Procurement of these items and services will be from many contractors providing similar items and services to the U.S. forces.

Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government or contractor personnel to Turkey.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SECURITY ASSISTANCE, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY,
Washington, DC, December 19, 1984.

Pursuant to section 620C(d) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended (the Act), and the authority vested in me by Department of State Delegation of Authority No. 145, I hereby certify that the provision to Turkey of Cooperative Logistic Support for follow on spares and supplies in support of various US-origin aircraft and other systems at an estimate cost of $88 million is consistent with the principles contained in section 620C(b) of the Act.

This certification will be made part of the certification to the Congress under section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act regarding the proposed sale of the above named articles and is based on the justification accompanying said certification, and of which such justification constitutes a full explanation.

REAUTHORIZE THE USTTA

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I today join others in the Senate in calling for a reauthorization of funds for the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration [USTTA], because I believe it is an essential and integral element in the effort to strengthen one of our Nation's largest industries and the most effective weapon we have in combatting record trade deficits. I urge my colleagues to support the effort as well, by acting expeditiously and favorably on S. 193, which authorizes funds for the USTTA for the next 3 years.

As a founder and cochairman of the Senate tourism caucus, I find it economically shortsighted for the administration to recommend the curtailment of the operations of the USTTA. Rather than zero out this agency, the administration ought to be arming it with more funds so it can lead the war against trade deficits.

Every economic fact of life argues in favor of a stronger, not weaker, national effort to strengthen the travel and tourism industry and to recapture our diminished share of international tourism receipts.

Consider first these facts: travel receipts make up 6.4 percent of the U.S. gross national product; expenditures amount to $210 billion a year; the industry means a $45.8 billion payroll; it means 4.6 million jobs and another 2.2 million people indirectly employed individuals; it means $13.8 billion in taxes for the Federal Government, $8.7 billion for State governments, and $2.8 billion for local governments—that's 6 percent of all taxes collected by all units of govenment in this country in 1983; and it means that international visitors reduced our bloated trade deficit by $11.4 billion in the same year. Otherwise that deficit in the U.S. trade balance would have been that much greater than the $61.55 billion it was for 1983.

The administration decision to abandon the USTTA also demonstrates a cavalier attitude toward a strategy developed by the industry itself. Late last year a panel representing every sector of the travel and tourism industry finished work on an international marketing plan.

Administration plans to eliminate the USTTA would upend the plan and the year of work that went into it. James C. Collins, senior vice president for marketing of the Hilton Hotels Corp., and chairman of the International Marketing Plan Development Committee, said:

> The principal goal of the plan is to provide the United States Travel and Tourism Administration with a marketing strategy to return the United States to a 13-percent share of the international tourism market.

It has been 9 years since the United States had a 13-percent share of a then $45 billion world tourism market; last year it had fallen to 10 percent. Each percentage point increase would reduce our trade deficit by over a billion dollars, add thousands of jobs and provide millions of dollars in taxes to every level of Government in the United States. Yet, the administration declares, with its plan to eliminate the USTTA, that this effort isn't worth the investment of the $7.6 million it cost to fund the agency in 1983, nor the $12 million it costs for fiscal year 1984, nor the $14.5 million called for by S. 193 in fiscal year 1986.

Other governments across the world and in the capitals of the states throughout pointedly do not share the view of the administration. More than 80 nations spend more on a per capita basis to promote tourism than does the United States.

In addition to the per capita comparisons, figures on total dollars spent to promote tourism show the same, unfavorable comparison. Nations ranging from the city state of Singapore to the island of Hong Kong, from Korea to France, and from Mexico to Egypt—all spend more than the United States.

Finally consider the budgets of individuals States in our Nation. New York, Florida, Michigan, and Alaska all spent as much or more than the United States did on the promotion of tourism in 1983. Tennessee, my home State, and the States that border it spent $31.4 million on tourism; this is four times what the U.S. Government spent on tourism that year. Altogether, the 50 States spent over $132 million on tourism—almost 20 times what the Federal Government spent.

Mr. President, I ask that charts containing the information I have just highlighted be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

It is clear that the States in our own United States and nations all over the world all know that promotion of tourism is a sound investment.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and in both Houses of the Congress to recognize this investment, and to join in working for the passage of S. 193, which will continue the work of the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, set in motion the process of recapturing our Nation's share of the world tourism market, and promote and strengthen the interests of one of our most important industries.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1985

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senate will convene at 12 noon on Thursday, January 24. After the two leaders are recognized under the standing order for 10 minutes each, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be recognized for not more than 15 minutes each on special orders: Senators PROXMIRE, METZENBAUM, SPECTER, and GOLDWATER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DESIGNATING A PERIOD FOR THE TRANSITION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the execution of the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1:30 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES TO RECEIVE A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 1, which is at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER) laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 1 providing for a joint session of the House and Senate on Wednesday, February 6, 1985, at 9 o'clock post meridiem, which reads as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, February 6, 1985, at 9 o'clock post meridiem, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this resolution has been cleared on both sides. It simply provides that there will be a joint session on Wednesday, February 6, 1985, at 9 p.m., to receive the State of the Union Message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) was agreed to.

RECESS UNTIL THURSDAY, JANUARY 24, 1985

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition at this point. I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate now stand in recess until 12 noon on Thursday, January 24, 1985.

The motion was agreed to and, at 3:45 p.m., the Senate recessed until Thursday, January 24, 1985, at 12 noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, January 22, 1985

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O gracious God, we remember with respect and appreciation Your servant, Gillis Long, and may the presence and hope and strength of Your spirit be with his family whose joy has been turned to mourning. We express our gratitude for his dedication to the work of this assembly, for his concern for the men and women he represented, and for his responsibility to the needs of our Nation. May his spirit of service to others continue to inspire us to use our talents and vocations in ways that glorify You, O God, and are a blessing to people everywhere. May Your peace, that passes all human understanding, be with his family and those he loved. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS-ELECT

The SPEAKER. Are there any Members of the Congress who have not been sworn in as yet?

Messrs. FOWLER and HEFTEL of Hawaii appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

The SPEAKER. Congratulations. You are now Members of the 99th Congress of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution:

S. RES. 39

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Gillis Long, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit an enrolled copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the Senate recesses today, it recess as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative.

THE LATE HONORABLE GILLIS W. LONG

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 29) on the death of the Honorable Gillis W. Long, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 29

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Gillis W. Long, a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That a committee of such Members of the House as the Speaker may designate, together with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That when the House adjourns today, it adjourn as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX].

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I would only take this time to say that there will be a special order in the House on Wednesday next, which is January 30, for those Members who wish to make remarks to be included in the RECORD on Gillis Long.

The second note would be that I think most Members have received a "Dear Colleague" letter in their offices to the effect that the funeral is Thursday in Louisiana, with a plane scheduled to depart from Andrews Air Force Base at 9:45 in the morning and to return to Washington and back to the Capitol here at approximately 7:45 p.m. on Thursday.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, and notwithstanding the adjournment of the House until Thursday, any Member who desires to go to the services will notify the Sergeant at Arms and he will notify the Speaker's office.

There was no objection.

ANTIBIOTICS PROTECTION ACT

(Mr. WEAVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Antibiotics Protection Act, a bill designed to preserve the effectiveness of lifesaving antibiotics from being squandered through overuse and indiscriminate use.

The use I refer to is the widespread practice of routinely mixing antibiotics into animal feeds. When animals are fed subtherapeutic doses of antibiotics, it does succeed in killing certain bacteria which can cause disease in livestock. Unfortunately, at the same time it creates an environment which allows antibiotic-resistant bacteria to flourish. Simply put, the antibiotics kill some bacteria, only to make it easier for others to grow. Scientists have long worried that such resistant bacteria could then be transmitted to humans who consume the meat, and that, once sick, those humans would not respond to treatment with antibiotics.

The use of antibiotics in animal feed is quite common. Each year, some 15 million pounds of the penicillin and tetracyclines approved for human use are added to animal feed. That's nearly half of the antibiotics produced annually in the United States. The Food and Drug Administration estimates that 80 percent of swine, 60 percent of cattle, and 30 percent of the chickens raised in the United States are fed subtherapeutic doses of antibiotics in their feed.

Several European Common Market countries, alarmed by the declining effectiveness of lifesaving antibiotics, have banned such antibiotic use for a decade. The Food and Drug Administration in 1977 proposed a similar ban here. But in this country, the practice has continued, largely because many Members of Congress were unconvinced by available scientific studies. Now I believe, the proof, the "smoking gun," is here. And it points to the need for swift action, before the value of antibiotics is eroded further.

The Center for Disease Control, in a study published last September in the New England Journal of Medicine, traced a salmonella outbreak in Minnesota and three other Midwestern States back to its original source, a cattle feedlot in South Dakota. In that feedlot, cows were fed subtherapeutic doses of antibiotics in their feed. The CDC researchers concluded that antibiotic-resistant bacteria survived in the beef, which became hamburger on the tables of 18 unsuspecting midwesterners. All of them got sick. Six were hospitalized, and in each case, treatment with antibiotics, the first drug of choice, were ineffective. One patient who became infected died.

The case illustrates the frightening scenario which scientists have long suspected—that we are creating in our livestock herds breeding grounds for bacteria which we are not equipped to defend against. Our front-line defense against infections have for the past three decades been the antibiotics, especially the penicillins and tetracyclines. Now, however, their effectiveness is diminishing at a rate which alarms scientists. Doctors are now forced from using their drug of choice to second or third choices, all less effective, and all prone to a greater number of side effects.

It is foolish to speed the decline of the effectiveness of human antibiotics by throwing them into the feedbin. The livestock and chemical industries say the antibiotics are vital to keep their herds healthy and to promote growth. This, they argue, produces less expensive meat on the table. This may well be partially true. But the antibiotics must be saved for the infinitely higher purpose of saving human lives.

The Food and Drug Administration has been petitioned by the Natural Resources Defense Council to implement a ban on antibiotics in livestock feeds. The council's petition was signed by over 300 leading medical scientists, physicians, biologists, and veterinarians. It is time—past time—for Congress to act. We cannot wait for more and more studies. The antibiotic-resistant bacteria multiply by the minute. The effectiveness of antibiotics for human treatment diminishes by the day. By failing to act, we are turning our backs on the most effective disease-fighting weapons ever discovered.

THE LATE HONORABLE JOHN W. BYRNES

(Mr. ROTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to inform the House of the death, on January 12, of our former colleague, the Honorable John W. Byrnes of Wisconsin.

John Byrnes served the Eighth Congressional District of Wisconsin with great distinction from 1945 until he retired in 1973. He served on the Committee on Ways and Means for 26 years, many of those years as the ranking minority member. There is no trade, tax, or Social Security legislation during that period which does not bear his stamp. He was also chairman of the Republican Policy Committee for three terms and for many years was the chairman of the Wisconsin House delegation.

A mere recitation of John Byrnes' biography is not enough to do him justice. Congressman Byrnes achieved a degree of national prominence unique in Wisconsin political history. He did so because of his keen intellect, his outstanding leadership and his unfailing commitment to deeply held principles. He was, above all else, an effective Congressman, a true representative of the people.

At this time I want to express my sympathy to Congressman Byrnes' wife, Barbara, his six children, and the rest of his family. They—and we—have all suffered a great loss.

CONGRESSMEN SWIFT AND THOMAS OF CALIFORNIA COMMENDED FOR WORK ON ELECTIONS TASK FORCE

(Mr. ANNUNZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend two outstanding members of the Committee on House Administration for their excellent work on elections. The two are the chairman and ranking Republican, respectively, on what has been our elections task force, AL SWIFT and BILL THOMAS.

Just last week, they achieved a significant agreement with the networks in the work they have been doing for the last 4 years on the subject of early projections of election returns. ABC, CBS, and NBC have agreed—as CNN and Westinghouse Broadcasting already had—that they will not use the data from their exit polls to suggest who has won an election before all polls in a State have closed. This is a major step forward in the effort to ensure that all citizens have an opportunity to vote, and to know that their votes count.

As chairman of the Committee on House Administration, I applaud Mr. SWIFT and Mr. THOMAS' continuing diligence and hard work, and their persistence in following through on the difficult issues that arise in the area of elections.

Finally, I appreciate their obvious concern, and the attention they have devoted to protecting the integrity of the electoral process in this country, which is an especially important part of the duties with which our committee is charged.

I would like them to know that their chairman, and their colleagues, appreciate the work that they do.

THE BOBS HILL GANG IS 74 YEARS OLD

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, the City Council of Aurora, IL, has declared February 4 as "Boy Scout Troop 3 Day" in that city, in honor of its Boy Scout troop, the second oldest such troop in the United States. While Scouting celebrates its 75th anniversary in 1985, troop 3 celebrates its 74th.

Troop 3 was founded in 1911 by Aurora Beacon-News reporter Charles Pierce Burton, who was also an author of a series of boys' adventure books. The troop's nickname, "The Bobs Hill Gang" is drawn from the title of one of Burton's works.

The highest decoration awarded by the Two Rivers Council of the Boy Scouts of America, of which the Aurora troop is part, is also named in honor of Burton.

The historic troop has been sponsored since its inception by the New England Congregational Church in Aurora. Since its founding, the troop has produced 150 Eagle Scouts.

I take pride in this opportunity to recognize the heritage and history of Aurora's troop 3 before this Congress. I encourage the troop's current 22 members, led by Scoutmaster Mark Vogelgesang, to carry on in the traditions and skills of past troop 3 Scouts whose mantle they now carry.

NEW PENALTY FOR NONPARENTAL KIDNAPING

(Mr. SMITH of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be allowed to extend their remarks on the subject matter of the introduction of this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DONNELLY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN] and I are introducing legislation to penalize with a mandatory life sentence without parole any nonparent who kidnaps a minor. In addition, if a minor is murdered during a kidnaping, this legislation allows the courts the option to impose the death penalty.

This legislation addresses a serious problem that faces our Nation today. Thousands of children annually disappear from their homes without a trace. The numbers of children that have vanished by abduction, assault, foul play, and murder are on the rise. The problem was brought to light by concerned groups such as the Adam Walsh Resource Center in Fort Lauderdale, FL. The time has come to enact severe measures to punish those who prey on our children. The Federal Government has made inroads in tracking missing and abused children. Still, our children continue to be harmed. The latest statistics show that an estimated 60 percent of missing children are sexually abused, physically exploited, and psychologically damaged through abduction and kidnaping.

I hope my colleagues will support this needed legislation.

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, on January 14, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children announced a statewide campaign for statutory reform to better protect our children. As legislators it is our duty to translate what we now know about crimes against children into careful consideration of statutory reforms that will better serve to protect our children. At this time, I think it is most appropriate to introduce Federal legislation that I believe will further protect our children from those who abduct, exploit, and even murder them.

Congressman LARRY SMITH and I have joined together in the introduction of legislation that amends section 1201 of title 18 of the United States Code, to provide for a mandatory life sentence without parole for any nonparent who kidnaps a minor. If a homicide results from a kidnaping, this legislation then provides for a mandatory life sentence or the death penalty depending on the court's determination.

There is no need to protect those who would steal our children from us. It is time to deal with this activity in a manner which fits its heinous nature. The answer is to remove these individuals from society on a permanent basis, so that no other children will be lost to them. I do not feel it is too harsh to say that one who kidnaps a child has forfeited his right to freedom. If we will not stand up for our children, who will?

The common good of our country demands that we take a strong stand on the problem of violence against our children. Preventive legislation is one step we as lawmakers can take. Support for this legislation shows that we have the courage to fight the battle to protect our children. I ask for your support.●

A TRIBUTE TO A YOUNG PENNSYLVANIA HEROINE

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, recently a rather big-for-his-age seventh grade boy was eating his lunch in the cafeteria of the Hershey Middle School in my district when all of a sudden he began choking with a bone stuck in his throat. Nothing was helpful to the young boy until a young seventh grade girl just half his size went behind him and executed the Heimlich maneuver in a perfect fashion, thus saving the life of this young boy.

This is a perfect example of the type of youngsters we see today who are more resourceful than we were when we were in that same category of student. We wish to have the name of this brave young girl, Jamie Rogers, remembered. She took no credit for what she did; she just returned back to her table and began to finish her lunch.

Mr. Speaker, we want to recognize Jamie Rogers of Hershey, PA, for calmly executing the life-saving venture called the Heimlich maneuver, and we together as the House of Representatives issue our joint congratulations to this young girl.

RIGHTFUL OWNERS OF VALUABLE ART OBJECTS FROM WORLD WAR II STILL DENIED POSSESSION

(Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, following World War II the Government of Austria received in trust from the victorious Allies a large number of valuable works of art which the Nazis had seized from the Jews of Europe before they were sent to death camps. The Austrian Government was charged as trustee with holding and delivering the confiscated artworks to their rightful owners.

There is reason to believe, Mr. Speaker, that that mandate has never been properly discharged. The Government of Austria has never given adequate notice and opportunity to the owners who lived and to the heirs of those who did not live to claim their property. Now the Government of Austria proposes to hold an auction of the works of art and to dispose of the proceeds.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge and request the Government of Austria to carry out the mandate and the trust with which it received those works of art and to provide an appropriate method of making sure that the owners or their heirs are given an opportunity to claim them.

RECOUNT IN DISPUTED INDIANA SEAT NEARS COMPLETION

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, when this House convened, the House by a party line vote refused to seat the certified winner in District 8 of Indiana and instead declared the seat vacant. Since that vote the recount procedure has been in process. That procedure is likely to be completed today, although it may be delayed if one judge or another wants the vote explained or perhaps attempted again.

At this time it looks as though the certified winner, candidate McIntyre, will have expanded his margin and will prove through the recount that he is the rightful winner. When that recount is completed, there will be an attempt to have the House seat Mr. McIntyre to his rightful seat.

Mr. Speaker, I hope at that time the House will be able to rectify the error that it made when it refused to seat him in the first place.

NATIONAL INDIGENT WOMEN'S ABORTION TRUST FUND

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to restore, voluntarily, abortion funding to those women previously eligible under Medicaid. My bill would ensure that poor women have equal access to complete pregnancy-related medical assistance.

My bill would amend the Internal Revenue Code to establish a national indigent abortion fund. It would be funded voluntarily by taxpayers through a checkoff system that allows the taxpayer to designate $1 of his or her income tax payment to be paid into the trust fund.

The amounts in the trust fund would then be available to pay the Federal share of the cost of medical services related to abortions which is presently unavailable to poor women in need of such assistance.

The bill is patterned after a bill that was introduced in the Colorado State Senate and passed its senate finance committee.

My bill is not a substitution for the Reproductive Health Equity Act, which repeals all current restrictions on the use of Federal funds for abortions. In fact, I am a cosponsor of that bill.

The national indigent women's abortion fund is a stopgap measure that we need to help those victims of rape and incest, who are not covered under the Medicaid abortion language. It's a measure we need to provide complete medical assistance to Medicaid-eligible women who are especially susceptible to the health risks, nutritional deficiencies, or limited access to health services that contribute to a substantially higher incidence of problem pregnancies and the need for abortion services.

Today marks the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court decision Roe versus Wade which established that a woman's right to privacy included choosing whether or not to carry a pregnancy to term. My legislation will allow poor women to use that right through the use of funds voluntarily designated by taxpayers for that purpose.

ECONOMIC COLLAPSE FEARED IN AGRICULTURAL HEARTLAND

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from spending 2 weeks in my district where I had some 40 meetings of an hour and a half apiece with my farmers, business people, and others, and I rise today to try to tell this Nation the problem that exists out there in the heartland of America.

We face an actual economic collapse. Those people who think what is happening today is simply a restructuring of our agricultural system do not realize what is occurring. When I had votes among our people who were in attendance at those meetings as to how many people thought we were going to have an actual collapse within 16 months, there were no hands that came up feeling that that was not likely to happen.

I would like to tell the people of this Nation that if they think this is a problem of a few farmers going broke, they do not know what the situation is. If we have that collapse through the heartland of America, it is not going to be just the problems in the heartland that affect us.

We recently had a cold snap hit the Middle West, and I know how the people of Florida look at that and say "How warm we are while you are cold." Let me say that if this hits, it will not be just the heartland; we are all going to be seriously affected by it.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the administration will start to realize the magnitude of this problem.

BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY GAINS PROMINENCE IN FOOTBALL AND MISS AMERICA PAGEANT

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, this is impromptu because I feel I would not like to take too much bragging rights. However, I would like to point out that I represent the Third District of Utah, and that I was a faculty member of Brigham Young University, which just recently has been voted the No. 1 college football team by most of the rankings.

I also represent that same school which produced Miss America, Sharlene Wells.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite the Members of this House to come to a reception in room 538 of the Senate Dirksen Building from 12 to 2:30 today to meet Miss Wells in person.

TREASURY SECRETARY'S TAX PLAN IS ANTIPRODUCTION AND ANTIECONOMIC GROWTH

(Mr. WATKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the President to repudiate his Treasury Secretary's tax plan because it is antieconomic growth and antidomestic production. It would lead to further deterioration of domestic production in the agriculture, energy, construction and manufacturing sectors because it would devastate capital formation, thereby crippling these capital-intensive industries.

While striking at our domestic production of energy and manufactured goods, the Regan tax plan would be good for cheap, imported consumer goods and for the gigantic multinational corporations that are desirous of a one-world economy. Their production is concentrated in foreign countries often utilizing slave labor and foreign government subsidies which allow them to flood the shorelines of the United States with imported goods. But it would be pure hell for domestic production, domestic economic and job growth and national security. The repeal of depletion allowances and the Intangible Drilling Act would alone destroy the energy industry in Oklahoma at a loss of more than 90,000 jobs. The result would be a service-oriented economy which does not produce the economic multipliers necessary to stimulate the job development and economic growth required to reduce the deficits and maintain anything that resembles the standard of living and quality of life that our citizens have enjoyed for the past 30 to 40 years. It would hasten the day when the United States becomes a debtor nation.

This week the President assumed the oath of office for a second 4-year term. This morning the administration released economic figures which it said painted a rosy picture of "continued economic recovery." Mr. President, I would be remiss if I did not remind you that all is not well on the domestic front. During the last 4 years, the United States has experienced:

An increase from $58 billion to $200 billion in record-breaking domestic budget deficits;

A growth from $28 billion to $125 billion in record-breaking trade deficits;

The highest "real" interest rates ever recorded;

The largest number of bank closures since the Great Depression;

The largest number of energy, business and industrial bankruptcies since the Great Depression;

And the largest number of farm foreclosures since the Great Depression, with a record-breaking farm debt of $220 billion.

On top of all this, Treasury Secretary Donald Regan has proposed a tax plan that would cripple domestic production-oriented industry. During the campaign, the President contended that deficits would be reduced by economic growth. Yet his Treasury Secretary's proposal would stymie that very economic growth the President is counting on. Mr. President, your indecision and continued detachment from this tax plan is having a negative impact on the investments required for domestic economic growth. Again, I urge you to repudiate Donald Regan's tax plan.

LEGISLATION TO DEAUTHORIZE ONAGA LAKE PROJECT

(Mr. SLATTERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, today, I am once again introducing legislation to deauthorized a Corps of Engineer water project in my district known as the Onaga Lake project.

The Onaga Lake project was first conceived in 1944 as a flood control project under the Missouri River study and later authorized through the Flood Control Act of 1962. The proposed lake would be located primarily in Pottawatomie County and cover almost 16,000 acres of land. The Corps of Engineers estimates that the Federal Government has already spent $2.1 million to study this project, although for several years now it has been classified in the inactive category. As you know, for a project to qualify for the inactive category, it must be deemed to lack economic justification; not adequately meet current and prospective needs; and lack the support of local interests. I assure you that the Onaga Lake project meets all qualifying requirements.

This legislation is important to my constituents because the continued authorization of the Onaga Lake project clouds the land titles of property owners in the area concerned. My constituents, who are predominately farmers, are presently unable to assure a prospective buyer that there is absolutely no plan for a 16,000-acre Federal water project on this land. Further, the estimated benefits to be derived from this project have long been discounted and, to this end, the State of Kansas had excluded the Onaga Lake project from the State water plan.

During the last session of Congress, I introduced this measure and saw it approved by the Public Works and Transportation Committee and the full House as part of the Water Resources Development Act. Unfortunately, the other Chamber failed to act on this measure. My constituents and I are hopeful that during the 99th Congress, the deauthorization of the Onaga Lake project will be accomplished.

JOINT REFERRAL OF H.R. 36 PROHIBITING PRODUCTION OF LETHAL BINARY CHEMICAL MUNITIONS BY THE UNITED STATES, TO COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES AND COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H.R. 36) to prohibit the production of lethal binary chemical munitions by the United States and to call on the President to enter into immediate negotiations with the Soviet Union for a mutual, verifiable ban on the production and stockpiling of chemical weapons be jointly referred to the Committee on Armed Services as well as to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, January 16, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you, pursuant to Rule L(50) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, that Mr. Paul L. Tsompanas of the committee staff has been served with a deposition subpoena issued by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

After consultation with the General Counsel to the Clerk, I will promptly inform you of the determinations required by the Rules of the House.

Sincerely,

LES ASPIN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY NEXT

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 a.m. on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

REPEAL LOGGING PROVISIONS FOR AUTO DRIVERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which would repeal in part the Tax Reform Act of 1984 with respect to those provisions that would compel every driver of every automobile who conducts any kind of business to maintain a complete log mile by mile on the use of that particular automobile.

Everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, the business community has the option under the law to use private automobiles and other vehicles for business purposes and are allowed to deduct as ordinary and business expenses those particular expenditures not for personal use.

And so we have lived under this system very satisfactorily for a long time. The new law that we passed in 1984, however, exerts a very burdensome requirement on our business community in that it requires them to log every single mile recorded by their various vehicles. We think that this is so burdensome that actually it is counterproductive. What it does is not to insure good records. What it does is to insure a diversion from good productivity. It forces a business entity to have their bookkeepers and all the other functionaries in their offices devote a full new desk and several drawers just to keep records of their automobiles and various usages made thereof.

What we would like to see is a return to the old system where proper records will be kept, but you will not have to force every driver of every automobile in a particular business to keep logs like a naval craft would for a worldwide journey.

Now, what do we mean to do by this? We want to release our business community from the burden of having to maintain these burdensome records so that they can continue and progress in the economic recovery through the rational use of their personnel and their vehicles and their property, to do business and to expand their payrolls and to further aid the economic recovery.

What we are doing in allowing this law to remain in effect, the one we are attempting to repeal here, is to cause them extra costs of doing business, just the opposite of what we are trying to foster in this economic recovery. To cause them to hire more people to keep track of what their drivers are going to be doing with these individual automobiles is to increase their costs and therefore another business expense will be used by them which will mean they will be paying less corporate income tax in any event.

So, is it not better to make sure that our IRS procedures would properly effect the collection of these taxes and to look over the shoulders of our business people as they take business deductions for the use of these automobiles, but making it impractical under the present law, the one we wish to repeal, by having them do this burdensome day by day reporting of mile after mile of usage of their automobiles.

We believe that over the past that our business community has shown good responsibility in properly allocating business use to personal use on their vehicles. There is no reason to believe that this procedure has changed in any dramatic way over the past few years.

Then to ask them now to change their whole procedures and put their CPA's and their accountants and their individual employees on to that additional burden of recording every single mile on their vehicles, and then later using calculators and computers to try to determine which was business use and which was personal use, is so burdensome, as we have said, that the opposite of what we are trying to accomplish will be occurring.

I would ask the Members of the House to join with me in sponsorship of this legislation. It will be a signal to us as we go forward with the budget process that we must take this into consideration as we fashion a working new budget and a deficit reduction for which we all yearn.

It will be helpful, I believe, when we can get the business community to support this measure which will be very helpful to them in their every day activities while at the same time asking for their cooperation in the overall effort we are going to make, as the U.S. Congress, to reduce the deficit in the future.

BAN CREDIT CARD SURCHARGES—FOREVER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, 7 out of 10 adult consumers have or use credit cards. Close to 700 million credit cards are in circulation today. Credit cards are not luxuries but necessities which provide the means to purchase essential goods and services when overtaxed household budgets cannot come up with cash. In short, most American consumers today rely heavily on the use of credit cards for emergency expenses, safe travel and everyday use. Today's American lives in a credit card economy.

This being the case, why do we allow the majority of consumers to be penalized for their use of credit cards? On February 27, 1984, the ban on credit card surcharges expired. Some States ban surcharges outright, and in others usury laws make surcharges illegal. Nevertheless, surcharges are now permissible in most States. Most merchants have not imposed surcharges while they wait for a congressional decision on the issue.

Last year the Senate passed legislation which would have legalized surcharges of up to 5 percent nationwide. Such legislation would not only override any State laws banning surcharges but open an era in which surcharges are permitted and encouraged. If we fail to pass legislation banning surcharges, the past Senate action may be taken for a sign that Congress now favors surcharges.

Some misguided consumer advocates claim that credit card surcharges are just and fair. Surcharges, they mistakenly argue, insure the cash paying consumer from paying for the convenience of the credit card-user. But under the guise of fairness, surcharges allow merchants to drain billions from already tight-budgeted American consumers. Surcharges benefit only an undeserving few and hurt everyone. This situation is disgraceful.

Credit card surcharges are counterproductive to a healthy economy, confusing, and unfair to all consumers. Credit card surcharges initiate price-spirals to the detriment of all. A surcharge increases prices, which naturally leads to purchase declines. And when purchases decline, the cost of goods and services increases even further for cash and credit users alike. Credit sales have become an essential part of the U.S. economy. Credit card sales last year totaled almost $300 billion. And there is very good evidence to suggest that credit card use stimulates the economy by enabling consumers to purchase goods and services when cash may be scarce.

The confusion generated by surcharges is intolerable. With surcharges, a multiple price system becomes established whereby one item may have three different prices: a cash price, a credit price, and a fictional regular price. Wise comparison shopping becomes more difficult than filling out income tax returns as consumers juggle unnecessarily complex prices. Rather than aiding consumers, surcharges only enable some gluttonous merchants to burden consumers with usurious charges.

Some have argued that without credit card surcharges, the cash-paying poor end up subsidizing the credit-paying rich. These same few have argued that overall costs of retailing goods and services are increased 3 to 6 percent by the use of credit cards. And, they argue, the lion's share of that extra cost is passed onto the cash-paying customer. These arguments are simply not true. First of all, credit cards are not just for the rich. One quarter of the people who earn under $10,000 a year use credit cards. Nearly 50 percent of the Nation's senior citizens use them. Most Americans today rely on some form of plastic money.

Second, what is wrong with the cash discount system? Cash discounts benefit all and penalize no one. The cash discount system enables merchants to give unlimited discounts to customers using cash instead of credit. And those who need or desire to use a credit card pay the regular price. Interestingly, despite legalized surcharges, most service stations continue to offer cash discounts. This system is fair to all and is complimentary to credit card use in spurring on sales.

Third, the Federal Reserve Board has found no evidence that cash customers pay higher prices as a result of their credit card-using counterparts. Its 1983 study found that higher finance charges and user fees places the brunt of the cost of credit card operations onto the credit card user. Furthermore, many merchants view the cost of handling credit card transactions as equivalent to the cost of handling cash transactions. Credit card surcharge advocates seem to forget the time consumed and money spend by merchants dealing with cash. The possibility of theft, for instance, requires precautions such as in-store security personnel and insurance fees. In fact, one study found that the cost of cash transactions was actualy higher than the cost of transactions made with credit cards.

In one form or another, the issue of credit card surcharges has been before Congress for over 10 years. On three different occasions we extended the ban on these unfair and dangerous surcharges. On January 3, 1985, I introduced H.R. 24, legislation which would permanently protect consumers from the injustice of credit card surcharges. A permanent ban of surcharges is long overdue. American consumers have grown to use credit cards more and more. And it is truly ironic that in a time when credit cards are more useful, and are being used more than they ever have before, their users—and ultimately all consumers—are being penalized.

I urge the Congress, therefore, to enact H.R. 24 to ban credit card surcharges permanently.●

A LOOK AT THE FUTURE FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, America is watching whether or not this House will be a part of the governing of this Nation in the future or is simply going to be a body which stands in the way of governing this Nation in the future.

Yesterday in his inaugural address President Reagan set forth a course of action. He said, in what I thought was an inspiring speech, that there were certain things that we need to get about doing if we are going to govern this Nation properly in the future.

What this House has as its agenda, as its obligation, is to begin proceeding down that course. Do we have to do everything the President asks? No.

Do we have to accept everything that comes up from the White House just the way it is sent up here? No.

But there are certain goals and certain kinds of programs that the President is asking the Nation to move toward that we should be a part of modifying, that we should be a part of moving so that in fact the course laid out by the President is a course into the future.

I must say that the initial indications of whether this House is going to be willing to move in that direction are not particularly encouraging. On the opening day when the rules of this House were adopted we specifically turned down reforms that were aimed at making this House into a more democratic body, meaning with a small "d;" in other words, a House willing to debate the issues, a House willing to face up to the issues, a House willing to tell America precisely what we were doing.

That rules package was brought to the floor by the minority leader. It was an excellent rules package and it should have been supported by anybody who believes in good Government, because what it was aimed at doing was opening up the processes of this body. It was turned down on a strict party line vote.

We are going to hear a lot in the course of this Congress about bipartisanship around here. Even an excellent rules package such as the minority leader brought forward could not engender any kind of bipartisanship in that opening day.

Let us think about what was in that package. One of the things in that package might be kind of interesting to the people across the country who view us on television. As I speak here today, I assume the status is still the same, that the cameras will be sweeping the Chamber showing a lot of empty seats. That was a process we instituted in the last Congress.

What the rules package that the minority leader suggested was that we continue with that practice, that that is fine, but that we ought to begin sweeping the Chamber during the regular sessions of the House as well, that during the legislative sessions of the House we ought to see just how many people are on the floor conducting the business of the Nation, because we would find out that there are an awful lot of people who maybe for very good and righteous reasons are not here but nevertheless they are not on the floor, and it might have people across the country asking where is their Congressman.

It is 25 minutes of 1 and they are asking where is my Congressman.

I think that is one of the things that we could do to begin to indicate to the Nation just what the legislative process is all about.

If in fact we do not want to lie to the Nation about what happens during special orders, that they are not delivered to standing room only audiences in the House, we ought to make the same admission about what goes on here during the course of the regular legislative day.

That was one part of the rules package that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], brought forward. It was turned down, as I said, on a party line vote, not a very auspicious start.

Then later on in that day and in other action, the minority was specifically denied a seat in the House of Representatives despite the fact that the Member of Congress came here duly certified by his State as the winner of the election in his State. Yet this body, voting on party lines, made the decision that Mr. McIntyre of Indiana would not be seated, an unprecedented action; never before in the history of the Congress has a Member who has been duly certified by his State, where there is absolutely no doubt that his State means for him to be seated, has such a Member ever been turned down in this body for seating. That is an unprecedented action that was taken here on the opening day. Not a very auspicious start for the kind of bipartisanship needed to govern the Nation in the future.

Then during the course of the inaugural activities here in Washington over the last couple of days I have had a chance to observe some of my Democratic colleagues talking on the television about what it is they want to see done in the future and how it is they are going to be helping to move the governing of the Nation forward. And, once again, I must say that it was a lack of encouraging information as far as I was concerned.

For example, I saw the gentleman from West Virginia, the minority leader in the other body, suggest on television that they are simply going to wait on the Republicans, that they have no agenda and they are going to sit back and simply criticize. That is not particularly the kind of bipartisanship that one would expect if we are going to move things forward on Capitol Hill.

But then we also heard this morning from the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee that serves in this Chamber who was talking about the fact that they want to cooperate with the President, and he made it quite clear that he thinks cooperation with the President is important. It is important, then, to realize how he thinks cooperation should take place.

For example, he suggested that they want to cooperate with the President on his goal toward a balanced budget, and in fact they had done everything that they could do in the last Congress toward that by adopting a pay-as-you-go budget. He did not go into the explanation of that pay-as-you-go budget. We all remember it well. It was a very high deficit budget that basically adopted all of the spending that is now in place, and then said, "If you are going to add anything else in the future, we are going to increase taxes in order to have those programs in the future."

That is not exactly the balanced budget approach the President I think is talking about, or the American people thought was appropriate.

In this election when the American people had the idea of additional taxes presented to them, the American people said overwhelmingly that they did not want new taxes. Recent polling information out also indicates the American people do not want new taxes.

□ 1240

So the pay-as-you-go approach brought to us by the Democrats last year was not a balanced budget approach, it was indefinite deficits coupled with higher and higher taxes. And if the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee thinks that that is cooperation with the President to suggest that that kind of budget will be a model of behavior for cooperation, it seems to me that he had better begin consulting a little bit with the American people, who overwhelmingly rejected his party in this last election.

It was interesting to note, I say as a footnote here, that he made quite a point of the fact that they really did not lose this last election because they elected Governors and they elected Members to this House, and so on, and he made a particular point, of course, about the election of Members to this House.

I would remind people that he had been somewhat misled over the last few months about what really happened in the congressional election, that the Republican Party nationwide got 49.6 percent of the votes cast for Congress. It was a very close election in the popular votes. It does not get reflected around here very well; in fact, when we started dividing up committee ratios we always seem to get disadvantaged in the House, even in terms of the numbers which we have here. We got 42 percent of the seats in the House, having gotten 49.6 percent of the vote. It shows you something of the way the Democratic legislatures have gerrymandered this country after the 1980 census, when you can get nearly half the votes and do not get anywhere close to half the seats in the House of Representatives.

It seems to me if we really wanted to be fair, if we really believed that the popular vote in this country had meaning, that instead of figuring out whether we get 42 percent of the seats on committees, which they are not really even willing to give us that much, that we ought to be getting half the seats on committees because that is really reflective of how people voted across this country.

In addition, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee talked about that they want to cooperate with the President on world peace, and I really believe that that is the case, that there is a strong feeling among all political elements in the country that we need to do what we can to move toward peace.

The question is whether or not they are willing to stand and do the kinds of things that the President has outlined are necessary to begin those negotiations toward world peace.

Once again, when the minority leader of the other body was talking on television today he suggested one of the things we ought to eliminate is the B-1, just unilaterally, just give it up, that we already have the Stealth somewhere down the pike, so we unilaterally give up the B-1.

Other members of that party suggest that we ought to unilaterally give up the MX missile. Other Members have talked about unilaterally giving up the strategic defense initiative. The question is, Do we want to negotiate toward world peace, and want to do something with the Soviet Union where unilaterally we are canceling out all these systems, where do the negotiations toward world peace come from? The United States at that point has simply given up. Why do the Soviets have any initiative whatsoever to do something with us toward negotiations if we in this body and particularly liberal Democrats in this body are willing to unilaterally give up all those things that we are able to take to the table to negotiate toward a more peaceful and stable world.

So, once again, not very auspicious from the standpoint of being willing to govern.

The chairman of the Democratic Campaign Congressional Committee also suggested they want to help the President on Social Security because the President said during the campaign that he does not want to cut Social Security. The President was serious about that.

The President I think means it when he says that he does not want to have any adverse impact on the people who are collecting Social Security. I think that is the majority position among Republicans in this House.

But once again that is always raised by the Democrats as a way of once again starting the fear tactics on Social Security; always raise the Social Security issue and make people fearful that something is going to be done in Washington to pull that blanket of support out from underneath them, that rug of support that they depend on will be canceled out by something done by the Republicans in this town.

That is just nonsense to begin with. But, second, it seems to me that it is a continuing pattern. It is very disturbing that we prey upon the elderly in the politics of this country by using scare tactics and fear tactics on every occasion. Liberal Democrats have become famous for getting to the end of campaigns and throwing out the scare tactic on Social Security as one of the ways of trying to win an election.

Well, we move onto the floor today and as I sat and listened today I heard a whole series of speeches where tax reform was called antigrowth.

I think the American people fully realize that if we could ever get special interest power out of our tax system that in fact it would bring about more growth, not less growth. The arguments were really made here on the floor today to the extent that this is a terrible thing that is going on when the President and the Treasury Department suggest we ought to have tax reform because it would impact adversely on a whole series of special interests. And we even had the nerve to come to the floor to tick off a whole series of special interests that might be affected by tax reform.

I would suggest that the American people sought to take a look at that kind of approach because it suggests to you precisely where Democrats believe their party's power comes from, it comes from all the special interest groups that they then come to the floor and attempt to protect.

The protection of special interests is what causes growth problems in this country, and I would hope, I would hope that as we analyze the potential for tax reform and particularly the potential for flattening the tax rates in this country, that people will begin to see that that really is what could cause the economy to grow by giving more people more access to their hard-earned dollars and thereby allow more investment and growth in the economy.

There is a refusal, there is a refusal among liberal Democrats to recognize the fact that this economy is growing. There is a refusal to recognize that we are improving in the economy. Have we solved all the problems? No.

Unemployment is still too high, interest rates are still too high, there are still many problems in the economy. But it is a much better economy than it was 4 years ago as a result of reforms and changes that were made.

To come to this floor and continue to suggest, as a couple of Members did in their speeches today, that there is something disastrously wrong out there, that we need to literally change the whole thing around and go back to the, basically, policies like those of the Carter administration, is, it seems to me, an incredible lack of perception about what is taking place in the economy today.

We had a report out just today, absolutely fantastic statistics about the growth rate of the economy during the final part of last year. If we can continue those growth rates out into the future we could do much to solve the budget deficit problem, we could do much to bring down the interest rates, we could do much to solve the unemployment problems that this country faces if we can continue to grow. If the Democrats go back to their tax-and-spend kinds of policies, if they do the kinds of things that they are suggesting on this floor that they want to do by protecting all the special interests throughout the country, by impacting adversely on our foreign trade with more and more protectionism, if they do all of those kinds of things we will in fact drag this economy back down, we will not get growth, and what we will have is even bigger deficits in the future.

It seems to me that as we look toward the possibility of governing that there can be no bipartisanship when the Democrats want to return to the failed economic policies because those that have failed us so miserably in the past simply cannot be endorsed on a bipartisan basis. They may make good politics but they are lousy ways of governing the country and there can be no bipartisanship on readopting failed policies of the past. There cannot be any bipartisanship when the Democrats use the rules of this House to disadvantage the minority, when they continue to come in with committee ratios that are such that the Republicans do not have a fair chance to get their policy options before the Congress. If seems to me that that drags down the bipartisanship that it takes for governing.

I would suggest that we had a speech a few weeks ago on the floor justifying why Democrats do that. I think it was the gentleman from Montana came out and told us that, in so many words, and this is my interpretation of what he said, that democracy just does not work very well; that every once in a while you have to turn to authoritarian tactics, that the Democrats have to have the kinds of super majorities on committees in order to get their policies enacted. I think that when we start suggesting that this House has to become more and more autocratic, more and more authoritarian in order to get its work done, that we have given up on democracy.

I personally think it is high time that we expand democracy, make this House more and more of an open body, and until the Democrats wake up to that it is going to be very, very hard to have bipartisanship toward governing the country.

I would also suggest that there cannot be bipartisanship when the first act of the majority is to try to steal a seat in the House away from the minority. And I do not think that we can be in a very bipartisan mood toward cooperating with suggestions from their side when we are in the process for the first time in history of trying to steal a certified seat from the State here in this body.

Our important task for the future is to get about the business of governing the Nation in the right way, to get about governing the Nation wisely.

□ 1250

The President outlined a course that this Nation should follow. A course that vast numbers of Americans voted for when they cast their votes for the President in the last election.

Whether we will follow that course and whether we will do what is right toward governing the Nation at this point is very much in doubt.

STATEMENT ON ABORTION: JANUARY 22, 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, 12 years ago today, the U.S. Supreme Court confirmed the constitutional right of women to decide for themselves one of the most important decisions they will face during the course of their lives:

Whether to bring an unwanted pregnancy to term.

Unplanned pregnancy and abortion were not new issues in 1973, however. It is estimated that between 200,000 and 1.2 million women a year were subjected to life and health endangering abortions, that hundreds of women died annually as a result of botched abortions, and thousands of women suffered permanent disability as a consequence of the procedures used by these women in their homes and in the underground network of back-alley abortionists. I saw the results of this butchery as a young prosecutor in New York charged with investigating and prosecuting these illegal abortionists.

It was in 1973 that the Court made it clear in Roe versus Wade that the "right of privacy, whether it be founded in the 14th amendment's concept of personal liberty * * * or * * * in the 9th amendment's reservation of rights of the people, is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy." The individual choice of abortion was not made easier, but a woman no longer had to risk her life as the result of her decision.

For the overwhelming majority of women, the choice to end an unwanted pregnancy is not an easy one. Each woman faces a different set of hard questions. One woman faces the effects of rape or incest; another's pregnancy threatens her life; another, thinking she was too old to become pregnant, fears for the health of the child; still another is too young or too poor to handle the responsibilities of motherhood. Whatever the reason, it is not without pain that a woman first enters the clinic's doors. But the Court, with its decision, made that fundamental choice hers.

Today, on the anniversary of that decision, these women are faced with a new barrier to exercising their constitutional rights: That of verbal harassment and physical violence by those who oppose their decisions and that of the Supreme Court. Pregnant women are now not only faced with their own set of difficult decisions, but with the aggressive judgment of others upon them. It is not uncommon for a woman approaching an abortion facility to be forced to endure verbal harassment by self-proclaimed pro-life counselors and hecklers. Some women have even been met by physical obstruction and abuse.

Since 1982 there have been 30 reported bombings at abortion clinics nationwide. Twenty-four of the bombings have taken place within the last year. Fortunately, no one has been physically harmed in these attacks. But, the constant threats received by the clinics, the physicians, and the patients have created an ever-present fear that "we might be next."

Leaders on both sides of the abortion issue have called these bombings criminal and anarchistic, and the President has condemned the bombings, pledging to do all in his power to bring the guilty to justice. But, while the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms [BATF], with the help of the FBI, has done an excellent job in its investigation, having made arrests in 20 of the attacks, President Reagan's continuing antiabortion rhetoric serves only to aggravate the confrontational situation which he has condemned.

So, instead of a day of commemoration for this historic Supreme Court decision, we are faced with a day which many fear will be met by stronger and more violent opposition. Two weeks ago, the BATF felt it necessary to issue a warning to abortion clinics and medical offices of a potential for increased violence today, provoked further by the Presidential inauguration. While the National Abortion Federation has advised all of its members to stay clear of their facilities during nonworking hours, the National Organization for Women made its members available over the inaugural weekend to hold vigils at clinics requesting their presence. It is deplorable that people are again being forced to risk their lives to protect what is now a constitutional right.

While I respect the rights of those who oppose the court's controversial decision to voice their concerns publicly, I would like to point out that there is a clear distinction between the freedom of speech of the protesters, and the obstruction of the civil rights of those seeking legal medical attention. Abortion is not an issue that should be taken lightly, but neither is the obstruction of individual freedom.

Mr. Speaker, one final note. I noted with appreciation and approval the wise suggestion made earlier today during the 1-minute sessions by our distinguished colleague from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] of her proposal to introduce legislation which will allow a voluntary $1 checkoff on income tax returns so that those who want to will allow their voluntary contributions to pay for the abortions of victims of rape and incest who, under current law are denied that right. It is a fair, equitable proposal, allowing the conscience of individuals who want their tax refund dollars to be used in that fashion, to be so utilized.

It seems to me that it provides a transitional way of providing assistance for those who desperately need it, and they cannot afford to pay for abortions under the circumstances of rape and incest.

EMERGENCY HOUSING ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Emergency Housing Assistance Act of 1985. The need for this legislation is urgent, and I intend to act expeditiously. Everyone is aware that the rate of home foreclosures is intolerably high, higher than in any year since the Great Depression. Many homeowners are still suffering from the effects of the severe recession of the early 1980's, but these families will be able to save their homes if we provide a reasonable degree of temporary assistance to help them through this crisis.

I offered similar legislation in the last Congress, and this legislation that was passed by a 20-vote margin in the House. Unfortunately, this proposal failed to receive any consideration at all in the other body of the Congress and so died, leaving countless numbers of families helpless and without hope in the face of imminent foreclosure. For those families who have held on but now face the threat of losing their homes, I hope that this legislation will pass swiftly through this Congress.

Even though the economy is expanding, it is imperative that we remember this: Nine and a half million Americans are officially reported as out of work today, and millions more are unemployed but too discouraged to seek work. There are 2½ million who have been unemployed for longer than 15 weeks. It is these millions to whom my bill is addressed; people who have lost their jobs through no fault of their own, who remain unemployed despite their best and diligent efforts to find work, and who now face the prospect of losing their homes. The economic recovery has not started for them; their economic desperation has not eased; and their prospects are not improved by the recent economic expansion. They remain innocent victims of a callous, cavalier economic and social policy.

Regardless of the tidings of economic recovery, the rate of home foreclosures today is at 5.86 percent—the highest in 30 years. It is also higher than the foreclosure rate in 1983, when the recession was at its depth. What kind of recovery is it when the rate of foreclosures increases? What kind of recovery is it when the amount of desperation and homelessness grows? What kind of recovery do we have when beneath the rosy figures we see a higher level of home mortgage foreclosures? If anything, the need for my emergency home mortgage assistance bill is greater now than it was last year.

We need to recognize that regardless of general economic recovery, there are industries and communities that remain in desperate straits. Automobile sales and production numbers look fine, but there are fewer jobs in the automobile industry today than there were a few years ago; automation has taken its toll. Likewise, where once recovery in autos meant recovery in steel, the steel industry remains depressed. Automobiles use less steel today than formerly; steel is a shrinking industry, both in tonnage and in employment. That great industrial heartland that we know as Smokestack America is facing enormous economic and social stress; my bill is addressed to the needs of those people whose jobs have not come back with recovery, whose communities have not bounced back with expansion, whose every effort to hold on has been frustrated by overwhelming forces.

We need to recognize that last year there were more bank failures than in any year since the Great Depression—and the prospect is that this year will be just as bad. This can only happen for one reason: hundreds of communities are in a depression. Farmers are worse off today than they have been in 40 years. Farms and farming communities, and industries that supply farmers, are in the gravest kind of difficulty. Where is economic recovery for them? It does not exist. My emergency housing assistance bill recognized that fact, and offers a reasonable response. It is callous, even irresponsible, to consign rural communities and small towns to economic oblivion, which is what has been done in these past 4 years.

I am not asking or proposing that assistance be extended to people who could retain their homes in any other way. I am not asking for a bailout for the imprudent or the improvident. I am asking only that we recognize the fact that economic recovery has been spotty, and that there are entire communities and industries that face immense difficulties. There are millions of workers out of jobs through no fault of their own and despite their best efforts to find new work; whose problems are overwhelming, and whose greatest hope is to hang on for a while longer, to keep the wolves away from the door. And that is what this bill does: It provides at least a modicum of help to people who face overwhelming and disastrous personal economic problems, through no fault of their own, and who face circumstances that are wholly beyond their control to change.

Just this weekend, we saw demonstrations in Minnesota, where farmers were demanding a moratorium on foreclosures. It is not the first such demonstration that we have seen, nor will it be the last. It is a measure of the economic hardship, deprivation and desperation that exists, recovery or no, in towns and cities all across this country. The Emergency Mortgage Assistance Act would provide help. Is help needed? Ask anybody who is facing financial disaster. I urge your support of this legislation.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR DROUGHT AND FAMINE RELIEF IN AFRICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce, on behalf of myself and the Honorable SILVIO CONTE, the famine relief and recovery in Africa bill, a supplemental appropriations bill for drought and famine relief in Africa. We are all painfully aware that the African Continent is in the throes of the worst drought in this century. The lives of millions of Africans are being threatened by hunger on a scale we in the developed world can only imagine. Ten million people are in immediate danger of starving to death.

Beyond the imminent threat of mass starvation, deprivation shackles human existence at every turn. Disease is rampant. Of the children who survive the famine, many will be physically or mentally handicapped for the rest of their lives.

As ranking Republican on the House Select Committee on Hunger, I had the unparalleled opportunity to view this crisis firsthand with a group of my House colleagues during a recent trip to Ethiopia. Words cannot describe the anguish I felt at the Korem and Makelle refugee camps. My sense of helplessness was overwhelming.

Today, the knowledge of the existence of such misery reminds us of the words of John Donne, "No man is an island." Indeed, we can be assured that the United States has proven to be "our brothers' keeper."

The administration's response to this disaster has been commendable. Once again, the official U.S. contribution to this relief effort has been second to none. U.S. emergency food aid to Africa so far in fiscal year 1985 is already twice the amount sent in 1984. The title II emergency fund of Public Law 480, used for drought and famine relief, is already depleted after only 3 months into the fiscal year. The Agency for International Development [AID] has told us that U.S. emergency feeding operations will be serverely hampered if new resources are not available by March. It is imperative that the Congress act immediately. As the drought intensifies and the famine spreads throughout Africa, clearly we, as a nation, are morally bound to extend our assistance to prevent further catastrophe.

Using figures from the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization, the World Food Program, and AID, Mr. CONTE and I calculate a 3.9-million-metric-ton shortfall in food aid needs between now and the end of the fiscal year. This assessment is based on the needs of the 18 most seriously affected African countries, as well as a small food aid requirement for Bangladesh, where the situation is also critical.

To arrive at this figure, we have looked at the cereals production and commercial food import figures for each affected country and made adjustments based on the crop and marketing year to approximate the U.S. fiscal year for purposes of this bill. The sum of these figures represents the amount of food a country is able to produce domestically or import, and includes estimates of informal food sources and farmer stocks. This figure is then subtracted from the food consumption needs that we project for each country based on population, past consumption, and food import patterns. We calculate the food gap between what a country is able to produce/import and what that country actually requires to feed its people. Hence, the 3.9-metric-ton food need figure for the remainder of fiscal year 1985. It represents the amount of required food not being supplied by the United States, the United Nations or other donors.

We feel strongly that, as in the past, the U.S. commitment should be based on providing 50 percent of assessed need—in this case, 1.9 million metric tons or the equivalent of $685.5 million. Our bill achieves that target. It does so by taking into account the administration's transfer of additional resources totaling $190 million to the emergency food aid budget, including 300,000 tons from the emergency wheat reserve. Our supplemental request for direct emergency food aid, therefore, is $495.5 million—the $685.5 million less the $190 million made available by the administration's actions. This total includes ocean transportation and one-half of the costs for inland transportation, to make sure that food is not only made available but gets to the starving of Africa. This additional food aid will be programmed by AID through both government-to-government agreements and through the private voluntary organizations active in famine relief in Africa. The remainder of the emergency food aid requirement is being met by other donors, such as the European Economic Community, Canada, and Australia.

In addition to food aid, this supplemental contains $132.5 million for emergency shelter, medical care and refugee programs. This additional aid will assist in medium-term recovery efforts linking emergency needs with agricultural development in order to help avoid conditions which could lead to future famines. The non-food-aid figure of $132.5 million is broken down as follows:

	Millions
Funding to assist private voluntary organizations in carrying out title II rehabilitation programs in health, water, and agricultural development	$10.0
Disaster assistance for shelter, emergency water needs, and $30,000,000 for emergency medical care, including vaccinations	70.0
Rehabilitation and recovery programs (under AID's agricultural, rural development, and nutrition account) for assistance to refugees, with 80 percent channeled through PVO's	30.0
Refugee programs, for African refugees and displaced persons (AID's African resettlement, services, and facilities project)	20.0
AID operating expenditures for monitoring of food aid and disaster assistance to prevent diversion	2.5
Total, nonfood needs	132.5

The total supplemental request for fiscal year 1985, including both emergency food and nonfood aid, is $628 million.

Given the deficit, we are sensitive to the budget pressures and difficult choices confronting us. This bill, is a responsible, reasoned approach to the African crisis, and it is commensurate with the need for continued strong American leadership on this issue. It is especially important that the Congress act swiftly on a supplemental if the additional aid we need to provide is to be effective and timely.

Again, the words of John Donne return to mind. "We are not an island," he wrote. "Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

Thankfully, the United States is involved in mankind, and its people will not allow us to ignore the deaths of men in Africa.

Mr. CONTE and I feel strongly that this $628 million appropriation will provide a lifeline for the millions who are in imminent danger of death and crippling disease that now threatens to decimate an entire generation of Africans. This Congress must act with resolve and speed.

There must be no delay or wavering by us, nor doubts by others that America will meet her responsibility. We are a generous and an idealistic people. Our response to this human catastrophe in Africa will be a telling manifestation of that.●

A TRIBUTE TO HOWARD HARRIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize and share with my colleagues in the House of Representatives the accomplishments of Mr. Howard Harris of San Benito County, CA. Mr. Harris has been active in agriculture all his life. He has served on the San Benito County Farm Bureau since graduating from University of California, Berkeley in 1934. He has served as representative, director, and president, of the State of California Farm Bureau, and as a representative on the Governor's water policy board. Howard has also served as a trustee for the Cienega Elementary School District, as president of the Hollister High School PTA, and is currently a trustee and chairman of the board of trustees for Gavilan College.

In addition, as if all of these activities were not enough to keep him busy, Howard has served as a leader of youth 4-H activities for 50 continuous years. It is this volunteer service that I would particularly ask my colleagues to note. During the past 50 years, Howard has served as president of the County 4-H Council, chaired several major council committees, directed the nature program for the 4-H summer camp, originated California's 4-H entomology project, and pioneered the 4-H woodworking and electricity projects in California.

Howard has been a key person in the lives of literally hundreds of children and young adults through his thoughtful guidance and personal example. I am proud to have the opportunity to acknowledge before this distinguished body the many valuable contributions of Howard Harris.●

ETHIOPIAN HUNGER PROBLEM BAFFLES THE MIND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in Ethiopia, a drought-stricken country, the enormity of the hunger problem baffles the mind. As I visited the feeding centers where gentle humans are restoring life to some of the starving, I was bewildered as to how to solve this crisis.

The problem of famine in Africa is real. Twenty nations have been affected. Seven are critical. Just in Ethiopia alone, over 7 million people are threatened by starvation.

A severe drought is a major cause. The rains either did not come or were less than is required to germinate the seeds in the fertile soil.

Agricultural techniques are backward. There are few drilled wells, little irrigation, almost no fertilizer used and severe topsoil erosion. If there is to be problem solving, it will be long term and it will be painful. Attitudes will have to be changed to use modern agricultural methods. And in Marxist countries, the collective farm reduces the farmer's incentive to produce for himself and only aggravates the sparse production.

There have been four major droughts in Ethiopia in the last 35 years. People have died of starvation. But this is the worst drought and death is apparent throughout the land.

My visit to Alamata and Korem, two feeding centers 250 miles north of Addis Ababa, was shocking. The emaciated bodies of young and old were overwhelming. One's emotions cannot be controlled as you see the helpless trying to survive. The huge numbers dulled my sense of hope.

Thousands have died and thousands more died in remote villages which statistics will not record. But there is hope—because humankind is responding—and responding well.

The free world is responding swiftly by sharing its abundance of food, medicine, and blankets. Help from Western nations, from the private sector and from government, is pouring in. People are acting out of their best humanitarian instincts.

The United States is leading the pack. There are not many "ugly Americans" in Africa today. We are responding from our generosity. And America is responding mightily.

Americans are responding as a government. President Reagan has announced his intention to provide one-half of the food assistance needed in Africa this year—a $500 million U.S. contribution. For Ethiopia, a Marxist state, with whom we have strained relations, $130 million in food is already planned. This Government-supplied grain is distributed by many private volunteer agencies, such as Catholic Relief and World Vision, and soon some will be given directly to the Ethiopian Government relief agency. The sacks bear the words: "Donated by the People of the United States of America."

The private sector is also responding. For 1985, food assistance to Ethiopia through private organizations is estimated to be $125 million, with another $22 million spent on Ethiopian refugees elsewhere.

The private sector from Florida responded magnificently. A "flight of mercy" was organized, funded, loaded, and flown to Addis Ababa, which bespeaks the generosity of Floridians.

The mission was conceived by my wife, Grace Nelson, as a needed response to the problems she had seen in Africa last summer. In Mali, she held a starving child in her arms. She has not been able to forget it. After organizing some fundraising activities, the thought of a "flight of mercy" came from a discussion with the editor of the Florida Times Union. He suggested that although people wanted to help, they needed a concrete mission to respond to and one which could be tracked to a successful conclusion.

This story is an American success story. A DC-8 was chartered and loaded with 40 tons of food, medicine and blankets, in the midst of ongoing fund drives. WCPX-TV in Orlando collected over $80,000 and two truckloads of blankets. World Vision, a Christian humanitarian organization, provided the mechanism for obtaining the 2 tons of medicine and 38 tons of fortified food, 11 tons of which were donated by a former Ethiopian official in Indiana. This special mixture of oats, powdered milk and honey, known as ATMIT, is indigenous to Ethiopia. Another $120,000 was raised before the flight departed Chicago on January 12.

The plane was so long you could hardly see from one end of the cargo bay to the other. During the 24-hour journey, our group of "food shepherds" slept on top of the pallets of fortified food using some of the donated blankets for warmth. It was a good feeling to know that our mission was one of trying to help the starving by actually taking food to them.

Our landing was the first of a stretch DC-8 on the Addis Ababa runway. TransAmerican Airlines and World Vision soon had the cargo unloaded.

Success does not come easily and indeed we soon had our problems. Food was being delayed to the feeding centers because rebel activity in the region interrupted transportation of supplies. When we finally were cleared for an old DC-3 to fly us to the camps, we found they were running dangerously low on food. But our supplies arrived just in time.

I shall never forget the children, also starved for affection, clinging to my hands and arms smiling in spite of their physical deprivation. They were proof that the World Vision feeding center was successful because only a few weeks before they had been lifeless and lethargic. Others were in intensive care, often with their mothers, as nutritional supplements were administered—sometimes through a tube because they were too weak to eat.

The staff was loving and kind, it showed. The nuns at the Missionaries of Charity Compound ministered to the dying. These sisters are sponsored by Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who had just paid a visit, greeting and blessing each person in the camp—9,000 of them. What a lesson in love.

There are those who say, "let them die." Their theories of overpopulation and survival of the fittest are practical, they say. Besides "why should we care about a foreign, strange land?" Fortunately, most of America does not think that way. The good will, hopes and prayers of Floridians were obvious in our specific flight of mercy. Many have responded before, others are following.

This mission was successful because of the spirit and character of our people. Perhaps it is best summed up in Matthew chapter 25: "When you did it for the least of these, you were doing it for me."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A TRIBUTE TO THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION CHURCH ON THEIR 100TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I call attention to a significant event which just passed in Illinois' Fifth Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent, and that event was the combined 100th anniversary of the Immaculate Conception Church.

The Immaculate Conception Parish in 1984 celebrated their 70th anniversary and Msgr. Damasus A. Mozeris just completed his 30th anniversary as pastor of the Immaculate Conception Church. This church and Monsignor Mozeris have made significant contributions to the people of the south side of Chicago.

I join with the residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to the Immaculate Conception Church and Monsignor Mozeris in their combined 100th anniversary. I would like to insert a detailed history of Monsignor Mozeris and the Immaculate Conception Parish into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION CHURCH

Immaculate Conception Church at 44th and California Ave. was organized in 1914 as a national parish to serve 60 Lithuanian Families who lived in the Brighton Park District on the south side of Chicago.

On Sept. 10, 1914, Archbishop James E. Quigley appointed Rev. Anthony M. Briszko to establish the new parish. Since his ordination in 1911, Father Briszko had been an assistant at the nearby Lithuanian Parish of Holy Cross at 46th and Wood Str.

In July 1949, Father Briszko was named a Papal Chamberlain with the title Very Reverend Monsignor in recognition of his work in establishing the Lithuanian College in Rome. He died on Sept. 2, 1953 at the age of 69.

Very Rev. Msgr. Damasus A. Mozeris, vice officialis of the Archdiocesan Metropolitan Tribunal, was appointed pastor of Immaculate Conception parish on Nov. 5, 1953. Under his leadership, a new school and church were built.

At the time of the parish's golden jubilee, which was celebrated on Oct. 18, 1964, 1,600 families belonged to Immaculate Conception parish and 790 children were enrolled in the school. On Christmas Day 1964, parishioners worshipped for the first time in the new edifice. The offical ceremony of dedication, scheduled for April 1965, was postponed due to the death of Cardinal Meyer.

On Oct. 2, 1966, Archbishop John P. Cody blessed Immaculate Conception Church. The modern edifice, which occupies the southeast corner of 44th and California Ave., was designed by the architectural firm of Belli & Belli. According to "The New World" the theme of the ch., from the circular baptistry in front, to the graceful sweep of the nave towards the main altar is to emphasize the Liturgy, and the public and social nature of the Mass.

The national parish of I.C. now includes second and third generation Lithuanians as well as several hundred Lithuanian families who came to Chicago from Germany in 1949 and 1950. Families of Polish, Irish, Italian, German, Mexican, Slovak, English, French, and Bohemian descent also belong to the congregation.

Associate pastors of I.C. Church include Rev. Fabian P. Kireilis, Spritual Leader of Council 36 of the Knights of Lithuania and Rev. Robert Martinkus.

"April 15, 1939 was a most memorable day in my life—the day I was ordained a priest by the late George Cardinal Mundelein at St. Mary of the Lake Seminary."—V. Rev. Msgr. D. A. Mozeris.

On April 15, Msgr. Mozeris returned to St. Mary of the Lake Seminary, where he and his classmates of 25 years ago observed their Silver Jubilee in the main chapel of the seminary, thanking Almighty God for the many blessings He has bestowed upon them.

Msgr. Mozeris was born on December 11, 1915, to Joseph and Valeria Mozeris in Cicero, Illinois. He received his education in St. Anthony's grade school in Cicero and Quigley Preparatory Seminary. Then, he attended St. Mary of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein for six years, remaining an additional year for post-graduate study. From 1940 to 1942, he attended the Catholic University of Washington, D.C.

Msgr. Mozeris holds a Doctorate in Sacred Theology (S.T.D.) and a Master's degree in Canon Law (J.C.L.).

On June 29, 1942, Msgr. Mozeris was assigned to the Metropolitan Tribunal as Notary, with residence at Holy Name Cathedral. Nine years later, on April 11, 1951, he was named Vice-Officialis of the Metropolitan Tribunal of the Archdiocese of Chicago.

On November 3, 1953, he was named Papal Chamberlain, with the title of the very Reverend Monsignor.

On November 5, 1953, His Eminence Samuel Cardinal Stritch appointed Monsignor Damasus A. Mozeris as the new pastor. The 37 year old Monsignor, after ten years in Chancery Office work, took to his new task with great enthusiasm and zeal.

Recognizing the need for more classrooms to accommodate the ever increasing number of school children, he began the construction of a two story addition to the school. The new structure consisted of a kindergarten, parish hall, principal's office and five classrooms. The cornerstone was blessed by Monsignor Ignatius Albavicius, pastor of St. Anthony Church in Cicero, on October 31, 1954. Cardinal Stritch dedicated the new addition on October 16, 1955. Included in the $275,000 building program was the renovation of the old school.

The remodeling and redecoration of the church, convent and rectory completed, in January of 1962, Monsignor Mozeris initiated the campaign for the building of a new, permanent church. In this Golden Jubliee Year of Immaculate Conception B.V.M. Parish the dream of the courageous pioneers will become a reality as old and young will enter the new church to give thanks to God for His many and great blessings.

NATIONAL INDEPENDENT RETAIL GROCERS WEEK

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the American independent retail grocer. Across this great Nation, in the largest cities and the smallest towns, they ensure the steady and uninterrupted flow of grocery products to the American consumer. These small business people raise the American free enterprise system to its highest levels, providing needed services to the communities in which they live and work.

Independent retail grocers account for 64 percent of all grocery stores in the United States and are responsible for nearly one-half of all grocery products distributed. They provide employment for over 1 million people. The independent retail grocery stores know no geographical or socioeconomic boundaries with locations as diverse as Beverly Hills, CA, the South Bronx of New York, and Spartanburg, SC.

The independent retail grocer exemplifies the small business entrepreneur, the backbone of the American free enterprise system. Usually operating one store, independent grocers tailor their businesses to serve the needs of the community where they are located. Independent retail grocers deliver the highest quality product at the least expense—unsurpassed by any other food distribution network in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues in the House to join me in honoring the American independent retail grocer by cosponsoring legislation I introduced today proclaiming September 8–14, 1985, as "National Independent Retail Grocers Week."●

SUPPORT FOR AN END TO ABORTIONS

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, today, thousands of concerned Americans are marching from the White House, along Constitution Avenue, to the Capitol and Supreme Court to urge the passage of the human life amendment and an end to abortion in the United States.

Since the Supreme Court made abortion-on-demand national policy in 1973, more than 16 million legal abortions of unborn children have occurred.

Abortion is an obvious tragedy for our Nation and for the millions of unborn children who have been denied their right to live.

But it is no less a tragedy for mothers for whom the consequences are less obvious, but still severe. Emotional difficulties following an abortion range from bad feelings to prolonged psychiatric trauma. Fathers are denied any say in the future of their unborn children.

The time to bring an end to abortion in this country is long overdue. I join the thousands of Americans who have come to Washington today and millions of others across the Nation in urging early action on the human life amendment.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO EAGLE SCOUT JAMES B. McNICHOL III

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to your attention the elevation of James B. McNichol of my district to the rank of Eagle Scout.

To achieve the rank of Eagle Scout, a Boy Scout must demonstrate leadership, integrity, and a dedication to high ideals. Jim, a resident of Edison and member of Troop 318, proved that he had these qualifies through his invaluable service to the township of Edison. He worked over 133 hours to help the township of Edison refile and move old files from its old municipal offices to its new complex to complete his Eagle Scout project.

I ask you to join me in congratulating Jim on the exceptional honor of becoming an Eagle Scout.●

EFFECT OF AMTRAK ELIMINATION ON NEW JERSEY COMMUTER SERVICE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration will likely be proposing the complete elimination of Federal assistance for Amtrak. This would not only result in the elimination of Amtrak and all intercity rail passenger service in the United States, but it would also have drastic effects on New Jersey rail commuters.

Many New Jersey commuters depend on Amtrak trains. For example, the Amtrak "Clocker" Service between New York and Philadelphia is heavily patronized by daily commuters. Without Amtrak, the "Clockers" would cease.

In addition, many New Jersey Transit trains, including its Northeast corridor line and its north Jersey coast line, use Amtrak's Northeast corridor. The Federal Government has spent over $2 billion to improve the corridor over the last decade. This vital infrastructure must be maintained. Currently, the corridor is used by Amtrak trains, New Jersey Transit commuter trains, other commuter operators in Philadelphia and New York, and Conrail freight trains. The high fixed costs of maintaining the corridor are currently shared by all users, but Amtrak, as the owner and dominant user of the corridor, bears the largest share of the costs. If Amtrak were eliminated, the other users would have to pick up the difference. I understand it could cost these other users about $172 million a year extra for such expenses as maintenance of way, dispatching, signaling, and station costs.

While it is difficult to allocate this cost to the various other users, the additional cost to New Jersey Transit might be about one-third of this, or about $50 to $60 million a year. This additional cost would be crippling to New Jersey Transit and the commuters who depend on it for their daily livelihood.

Of course, the administration has also been proposing the elimination of Federal operating assistance for mass transit. The proposal to eliminate Amtrak is just another indication of the administration's insensitivity to the needs of those who depend on mass transit.●

HONORING DR. KING

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, we met yesterday to inauguarate President Reagan for a second term and as he was the overwhelming choice of the American voters last November, we in the Congress wish him well in the 4 years ahead.

But as he begins his second term, it would do all of us good to note that in New York City we are celebrating the 50th anniversary of the birth of Dr. Martin Luther King.

We honor Dr. King for his unending work to promote civil rights in our Nation and we remember with sadness how an assassin's bullet ended the life of this remarkable man. For it was not only Dr. King's work on behalf of the civil rights movement that is a legacy for us today, it was his conviction that men and women of all cultures, races, and creeds must live with one another in a spirit of harmony.

Dr. King lived this example and the spirit of Dr. King's love for every human being permeates our memories of him today. It is this simple doctrine that, if followed, could end the needless arms races, the bickering between nations, and the many jealousies that afflict man today. I would hope that as President Reagan took his oath of office yesterday, the teachings of Dr. King were with him. There are many creeds that a man can take with him when he serves in public office, but loving your neighbor and assuring that all men and women get a fair chance at life is as good a way to serve the people as any I can think of.●

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, 67 years ago, on January 22, 1918, the independence of Ukraine was declared by the Ukrainian Central Rada, the Parliament of the Ukrainian people, with high hopes for a new era of national renewal dedicated to the principles of freedom, justice, and self-determination.

Sadly, these expectations were dashed by the Bolsheviks in 1920, when they reestablished Russian control over the new republic, ushering in a long and desolate period of spiritual darkness which persists today. Over the last 67 years, millions of innocent people in Ukraine have been persecuted and imprisoned by agents of the Soviet Government. Despite severe repression by the Communists, Ukrainian tradition has survived and endured, and the Ukrainians have kept alive their unwaivering belief in the ideals of liberty and representative government.

During the last year, the Soviets have been responsible for the death of four prominent Ukrainian human rights activists. Ukrainian Helsinki Group member Oleksiy Tykhy, Ukrainian writer, and journalist Valeriy Marchenko, and independent labor union movement leader Oleksiy Nikityn, all died as a direct result of being denied medical care by the Communists while in prison. Ukrainian Helsinki Group member Yuriy Lytvyn was driven to suicide in a Soviet labor camp.

The Soviets have been brutal in their systematic attempts to suppress dissent in Ukraine. Nevertheless, despite overwhelming odds, the spirit and courage of the Ukrainian people remain strong. At this point in the RECORD, I include information prepared by Americans for Human Rights in Ukraine, outlining the tragic fate of many brave individuals in the human rights movement in Ukraine who dared to stand up to the authorities.

This listing follows:

Below is a list of members of the human rights movement in Ukraine who were either murdered by the Soviet regime or were driven to suicide.

1. Yuriy Lytvyn, writer, member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group; served previous terms as a political prisoner, 1951–53, 1955–65, 1974–77; sentenced again in 1979 to 10 years' imprisonment and 5 years' exile. Died September 5, 1984 in Labor camp No. 36–1 near Perm, the R.S.F.S.R., driven to suicide. He was 50 years old.

2. Valeriy Marchenko, writer, translator, journalist; served a previous term as a political prisoner, 1973–81; sentenced again in March 1984 to 10 years' imprisonment and 5 years' exile; was seriously ill for much of both terms. Died October 7, 1984 in a prison hospital in Leningrad at age 37.

3. Oleksiy Tykhy, teacher, founding member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group; served a previous term as a political prisoner, 1957–64; in 1977 sentenced again to 10 years' imprisonment and 5 years' exile. Died in May 1984 in the hospital of labor camp No. 36–1 at age 57.

4. Oleksiy Nikityn, mining engineer, leader of the independent labor union movement; served a previous term as a political prisoner, 1972–76; incarcerated in a special psychiatric hospital in 1977. Died in spring 1984 at age 47, a few weeks after being released.

5. Volodymyr Ivasiuk, composer. Tortured and murdered in May 1979. He was 30 years old.

6. Volodymyr Osadchy, brother of well-known Ukrainian dissident author and former political prisoner Mykhaylo Osadchy. Murdered in April 1979 at age 33.

7. Mykhaylo Melnyk, historian, teacher, member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group. Died in March 1979 at age 35, driven to suicide by KGB harassment.

8. Viktor Kindratyshyn, artist. Murdered in November 1979 at age 27.

9. Rostyslav Paletsky, artist. Murdered in March 1978 at age 46.

10. Alla Horska, artist. Murdered in November 1970 at age 41.

The following two Ukrainian human rights activists have become crippled for life as a result of having been denied medical care while imprisoned.

1. Yuriy Shukhevych, member of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group, son of the commander-in-chief of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army; imprisoned 1947-68, 1972-82 for his continued refusal to renounce his father. As a result of mistreatment and lack of medical care while imprisoned went totally blind. Presently serving term of exile.

2. Ivan Svitlychny, writer, literary critic; served eight-month term of imprisonment in 1965-66; released in 1984 after serving full term of 7 years' imprisonment and 5 years' exile. As a result of mistreatment and lack of medical care during imprisonment he is paralyzed.

The same tragic fate—death or total disability—awaits many other political prisoners from whom the Soviet regime withholds medical care as a means of reprisal or additional pressure. Among those whose situation is especially threatening are:

1. Anatoliy Koryagin, psychiatrist, serving a prison term;

2. Vasyl Stus, poet, imprisoned in a labor camp;

3. Zoryan Popadiuk, student activist, imprisonment in a labor camp;

4. Yuriy Badzyo, historian, imprisoned in a labor camp;

5. Mykola Rudenko, writer, head of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group, serving term in exile.

Today, Ukrainian writers, literary critics, journalists, professores students, artists, scientists, and all representatives of Ukraine society who desire to maintain their nationality, their culture, and their religion, are still periodically arrested, beaten, and tortured by Soviet authorities for their efforts to assert their Ukrainian consciousness and to resist the decades-old campaign to destroy Ukrainian self-identity. Leaders in Ukrainian society, aided and supported by Ukrainians living in freedom in other countries throughout the world, are courageously continuing their struggle to turn the precious ideals of freedom into a working everyday reality, and the Communists have been unable to completely crush the desire for liberty and human dignity in Ukraine. We in Congress should continue to support the Ukrainians in their efforts, and must condemn Soviet conduct in the strongest possible terms.

Mr. Speaker, on the 67th anniversary of Ukrainian independence, it is with pride that I pay tribute to millions of Ukrainians who are continuing their struggle to achieve the blessings of liberty in their own homeland, and I am honored to join with Americans of Ukrainian descent in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I represent, and all over this Nation, who continue to cherish the hope of eventual independence and a free Ukraine. The spirit of the people of Ukraine is a testimony to the fact that tyranny, no matter how brutal or oppressive, cannot conquer the soul and resolve of a nation and its people.●

TO AMEND THE STAGGERS RAIL ACT OF 1980

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today, I am reintroducing legislation I sponsored during the last Congress which would amend the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 with respect to determinations of market dominance and standards for railroad rate reasonableness.

This legislation is in response to the irresponsible manner in which the Interstate Commerce Commission has implemented provisions of the 1980 act which affect shippers of bulk commodities who are captive to a single railroad and as such, do not ship in a competitive transportation environment.

While it was our intention in the Staggers Act to provide the Nation's railroads with greater freedoms so that they may regain their financial health, this regulatory flexibility was not extended to traffic which is market dominant to the railroads. Since such traffic is without competitive transportation alternatives, the Congress charged the ICC with the responsibility of insuring that rates on this traffic are maintained at reasonable levels and that such traffic is not made to bear an undue burden in the revitalization of the railroad industry.

In essence, the Congress said that where a railroad holds monopoly power over the transportation of a commodity, the ICC must maintain jurisdiction over railroad rates to insure they are reasonable.

Under this scenario, if a shipper believes that its rates are not reasonable, that shipper must first prove its traffic is market dominant to the railroad. As defiend by both the 4R Act of 1976 and the Staggers Act of 1980, market dominance is an absence of effective competition from other carriers or modes of transportation for the transportation to which a rate applies.

If the shipper proves railroad market dominance, the ICC is to then determine whether the rate in question is reasonable. One consideration of rate reasonableness is whether the railroad is earning adequate revenues. Other factors to be used in making a reasonableness determination are contained in the so-called Long-Cannon amendment to the Staggers Act which concern the relationship of the rate to the railroad's fixed cost of service, the reasonableness of the fixed cost contribution sought from the traffic and the effect of the rate on national energy goals.

While my explanation of this procedure is simplified, I would now discuss how the ICC has interpreted and implemented provisions which we all felt would provide necessary protections to captive traffic.

The Commission in its market dominance proceeding decided to consider the presence of product and geographic competition along with intermodal and intramodal transportation competition when determining the existence of market dominance. The use of product and geographic competition is, in my view, not within the scope of the statutory definition of the term market dominance. That definition speaks only of competition from other railroads or other modes of transportation. Moreover, consideration of product and geographic competition is arbitrary because, in the case of coal movements to an electric utility, it could always be shown that the utility, with respect to product competition, could burn natural gas instead of coal, or, with respect to geographic competition, it could purchase coal from Wyoming instead of West Virginia.

As I have mentioned, a key element in determining rate reasonableness is whether the railroad is revenue adequate. The Commission's method of determining revenue adequacy leaves much to be desired as it has not found a single class I railroad to be receiving adequate revenues. This is due to a degree of accounting hocus-pocus inherent in the ICC's method of computing revenue adequacy which does not provide a realistic picture of the railroads' true financial condition. Under this method, the railroads' income is minimized while its asset base is maximized and the cost of capital to the railroad is increased.

The Commission has ignored any other consideration of rate reasonableness and has chosen to rely solely on revenue adequacy in making such a determination. As such, the danger exists that although traffic may be found to be market dominant, no matter how high the rate is, it will be found to be reasonable since the railroads are all revenue inadequate.

As part of its implementation of these matters, the ICC developed the "Coal Rate Guidelines Nationwide" which have been the subject of great concern among both shippers and consumers. As proposed by the Commission, these guidelines will lead to higher electric utility rates for consumers as well as greater costs on just about every bulk commodity moved by the railroads since the guidelines will be applied to noncoal traffic as well.

On that note, I believe what we must all realize is that this is not an issue of concern only to coal, or to the electric utility industry, or to grain or chemicals or to any of the other bulk commodities. This is a consumer issue. For it will be the consumer who will pay the price in their electricity bills of unreasonable railroad coal rates. It will be the consumer who will pay the price in their agricultural products of increased railroad grain rates. And it will be the consumer who will ultimately pay the price of these railroad rates on all other bulk commodities as well.

The legislation I am reintroducing, and which is being sponsored in the other body by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, WENDELL FORD, is a moderate proposal to rectify the situation I have described. It is not reregulation. It is simply an attempt to put into place the policy Congress intended in enacting the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. Following my comments, I am inserting a section-by-section analysis of this legislation.

At this point, I would like to express by appreciation to my colleagues who cosponsored this legislation during the last Congress and it is my hope they will again join in this effort. I would further commend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, JOHN DINGELL, and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, JAMES FLORIO, for their interest in this most important matter. It is my intention to continue a dialog with these fine gentlemen who are certainly champions of consumer interests.

The section-by-section analysis follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1—Rail Transportation Policy:

This section amends two of the policy statements set forth in the Interstate Commerce Act at 49 U.S.C. § 10101a which have been relied upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission as supporting its proposed new constrained market pricing ratemaking methodology. The Commission's basic philosophy in the Coal Rate Guidelines decision is that the railroads should be permitted to set rates on captive traffic on the basis of demand considerations, i.e., whatever the traffic will bear.

Section 10101a(1) presently reads as follows:

To allow, to the maximum extent possible, competition and the demand for services to establish reasonable rates for transportation by rail.

The language referring to demand for services would be deleted and the language concerning competition would be clarified so that this provision would read:

To allow, to the maximum extent possible, competition among carriers to provide transportation services to establish reasonable rates for transportation by rail.

Paragraph 6 of the rail transportation policy (§ 10101a(6)) would also be amended to make it clear that rates on captive traffic must be maintained at reasonable levels even where a carrier has not achieved adequate revenues. In other words, this amendment is intended to refute the notion that the mere fact that a carrier has "inadequate" revenues on a system-wide basis should not justify allowing the carrier to charge whatever rate it desires on an individual movement. At present, this paragraph reads as follows:

To maintain reasonable rates where there is an absence of effective competition and where rail rates provide revenues which exceed the amount necessary to maintain the rail system and to attract capital.

This language was cited by the ICC in its Coal Rate Guidelines decision as justifying the view that until a carrier has achieved revenue adequacy, it is not necessary to scrutinize closely the reasonableness of individual rates. As amended by the bill, the provision would read:

To maintain reasonable rates where there is an absence of effective competition as defined in section 10709(a).

Section 2—Standard for Rail Rates and Burden of Proof:

In the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, the rail rates standard section of the Interstate Commerce Act was amended to specify that the ICC should consider a carrier's need to achieve adequate revenues in determining the reasonableness of a rate. This was the only criterion of rate reasonableness that was set forth in the rail rate standards section of the law. The Long-Cannon rate reasonableness factors were set forth separately in another provision of the law.

The ICC has treated revenue adequacy as virtually the sole consideration in determining rate reasonableness. The Long-Cannon factors have been given lip service but have been largely ignored. Section 2 of the bill addresses this problem in three separate ways.

First, the burden of proof is imposed on a railroad to establish the reasonableness of any rail rate (assuming, of course, that the jurisdictional prerequisite of market dominance is satisfied) where the rate in question exceeds 190% of variable costs. Under present law, the burden of proof as to the reasonableness of a rate is only imposed on a carrier in investigation proceedings (i.e., a proceeding initiated before a rate becomes effective). As a practical matter, the Commission has, of late, refused to institute any investigation proceedings and there is nothing a shipper can do where the Commission refuses an investigation, because the law is very clear that such decisions are not subject to judicial review. The shipper is free to file a complaint case after the rate becomes effective, but the burden of proof on the issue of reasonableness lies with the shipper in all complaint proceedings.

This section would also make it clear that railroads have the burden of going forward with evidence responsive to the Long-Cannon criteria (set out in 49 U.S.C. § 10707a(e)(2)(C)).

This is responsive to the problem which has arisen in many cases before the Commission where the rail carriers alone possess the information necessary to address these factors relating to rate reasonableness. The railroads have refused to provide such information to shippers in discovery proceedings and the Commission has not required it to be divulged.

Finally, this section amends the law in a manner which would make it clear that although revenue adequacy is an important consideration in maximum rate determinations, the Commission must also take into account a number of other important factors. The language of this provision would greatly reduce the present emphasis on adequate revenues, and would explicitly tie revenue adequacy considerations to the Long-Cannon factors. The factors which would be added to the rail rate standards provision concern the relationship of a challenged rate to the carrier's cost of service, the reasonableness of the fixed cost contribution sought from the traffic, and the effect of the rate on attainment of national energy goals.

Section 3—Revenue Adequacy:

This provision would require the Commission to take into consideration a variety of widely-utilized indicators of financial health in addition to return on investment in determining revenue adequacy, and would refine the manner in which the Commission calculates return on investment. It would direct the Commission to calculate return based on the depreciated original cost of rail assets (as opposed to reproduction costs as the Commission has recently proposed); it would exclude deferred tax reserves from the investment base (which the Commission includes under its current approach); and would require a rulemaking proceeding for the purpose of eliminating from the railroads' investment base assets which are not used and useful in providing railroad transportation services.

Under this new provision, the Commission's revenue adequacy determinations could be expected to more closely conform with the real-world view of the financial health of the rail industry.

Section 4—Rail Cost Adjustment Factor:

The legislative history of the Staggers Act clearly reflects that Congress intended the Commission to take into consideration railroad productivity in developing its inflation index that is published on a quarterly basis. To date, however, the Commission has failed to do so, and subsection (a) of Section 5 would make it clear that the Commission must consider changes in railroad productivity in calculating the index.

The effect of taking productivity into account in calculating the index would be to measure more accurately the effects of inflation on railroad costs. Rate increases taken pursuant to the inflation index are not subject to challenge, and failing to consider productivity has yielded the railroad industry repeated, automatic, unchallengeable, profit increases under the guise of recovering increased costs due to inflation.

Section 5—Market Dominance—Exemptions:

This provision would prohibit the ICC from exempting market dominant traffic from regulation. This is responsive to the decision in the Export Coal case.

It would also make it clear that in making market dominance determinations, the Commission's analysis must be restricted to transportation competition, and cannot include consideration of geographic and product competition.

Finally, it would codify the market share and substantial investment presumptions of market dominance which were contained in the Commission's market dominance regulations, that were in force when the Staggers Act was enacted, but would require market dominance to be found (as opposed to establishing a presumption that market dominance existed) if either of these tests were met.

CONGRATULATIONS TO EAGLE SCOUT SCOTT A. DANISKAS

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to your attention the elevation of Scott A. Daniskas of my district to the rank of Eagle Scout.

Less than 1 percent of all the boys in America achieve the rank of Eagle Scout. This high honor can only be attained if a Scout demonstrates strong leadership abilities. Scott, a resident of Edison, and a member of troop 318, has proven that he has the ability to become an Eagle Scout. To complete his Eagle Scout project, Scott organized 30 Scouts, parents, and friends to give St. Helena's Church in Edison a facelift. They removed the old white rock border from around the church and replaced it with a new rock border with a rubber edger to keep it in place. They also weeded around the church and school, in all doing over 300 hours of work.

I ask you all to join me in commending Scott in the exceptional honor of becoming an Eagle Scout.●

COMMEMORATING UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 67th Anniversary of the Independence of the Ukraine. I am proud to join with those people of Ukrainian origin in commemorating this occasion.

While we celebrate the 67th Anniversary of the Independent Ukrainian state, we must remember that the history of this proud and fiercely independent people runs throughout history. Even in the face of brutal assaults on the religious and cultural values of the Ukrainian people by the U.S.S.R., Ukrainian culture and tradition still thrives.

As we well know, the freedom of the Ukrainian people was short lived, although the quest for freedom continues today. On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainina Central Rada in Kiev proclaimed the sovereign and independent state of the Ukrainian people. The independence of this nation gained further credence in November 1918 by the addition of western Ukraine to the new United Ukrainian Republic. However, it was not long before the numerically superior armies of Communist Russia invaded the newly independent state. The Ukrainians fought 3 long years against tremendous odds before losing their freedom to the Russians.

Since that time Ukrainians have refused to allow the flame of freedom to die. We are all aware of the efforts of the Helsinki Monitoring Group in the Ukraine and the ultimate Soviet oppression and persecution of its members during the past 2 years. The plight of these people must be addressed by the international community.

In the light of the sacrifices and struggle of Ukrainians for freedom, it is a pleasure to join with my colleagues in recognizing the quest of the Ukrainian people for their own independent nation.●

NATIONAL CHILDREN'S WEEK

HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, last year the Congress passed a resolution I had introduced to designate a National Children's Week in October. The needs of our Nation's 65 million children still warrant the attention of the Congress and of our communities, and today I am again introducing a resolution with 38 cosponsors to designate a National Children's Week beginning October 6, 1985. Senator QUAYLE is introducing an identical bill in the Senate.

As you may recall, in 1982 in Atlanta, a dedicated group of my constituents conducted a highly successful children's week, which brought together volunteer agencies, State and local officials, educators, and other concerned individuals to review the needs of our children and the services being provided to them in our area. The extraordinary success of this program at the local level provided the impetus to expand Children's Week to communities across the Nation. National Children's Week subsequently became law.

A guidebook outlining how communities can conduct an effective Children's Week Program was published with a grant from a foundation. This publication, and the designation of National Children's Week, have proven successful in stimulating an examination of the needs of American children and the ways in which we can ensure that future generations are provided for in a thoughtful and comprehensive way. We are making progress in better understanding and caring for our Nation's most valuable resource, and I am again proposing a National Children's Week so that we can continue this progress.

I believe this can be an extremely worthwhile effort, and I hope all my colleagues will join me in support of National Children's Week.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE LONG BEACH GRAND PRIX'S "COMMITTEE OF 300"

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 10th anniversary of the Long Beach Grand Prix's "Committee of 300."

The Long Beach Grand Prix, which has become one of the racing circuit's premier events, has been one of the key ingredients to bring the city of Long Beach back to life and make it a truly "International City."

Of course, a successful event such as this does not happen overnight. It takes an organized team of volunteers from the community to devote the time and energy necessary to plan and carry out the many events associated with the race.

The Committee of 300 was organized a decade ago to assist with the preparation of the race and its great success over the years is indeed a tribute to all those who have graciously devoted their valuable time to this special event.

The committee, which is an administrative arm of the Long Beach Area Chamber of Commerce, is a nonprofit organization whose sole purpose is promoting the city of Long Beach through the Long Beach Grand Prix. For the first race, the committee had a contingent of 70 members; today, it has not only reached its full membership of 300, but there is a waiting list of over 100 persons.

Although there are many, most notably Monty Sharp, Long Beach Chamber of Commerce executive, and Chris Pook, Long Beach Grand Prix Association president and founder, who have played significant roles in fostering the development of the Long Beach Grand Prix, I would like to especially congratulate each president of the Committee of 300—Jim Willingham, 1975-76, Dr. James C. Serles, 1977, Roger Jesme, 1978, Mason T. Kight, 1979, Henry Meyer, 1980, Norm Reed, 1981, Roderic Ballance, 1982, Hank Wadleigh, 1983, Chuck Davis, 1984, and John Knauf, 1985—on a terrific job.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, the Committee of 300 is the driving force behind the Long Beach Grand Prix and is responsible for it being one of southern California's most unique and successful sporting events.

My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating and commending the Committee of 300 on a tremendous job over the past 10 years. We wish the committee continued success and we know that through its support, the Long Beach Grand Prix will remain as one of the top racing events in the world.●

FOR THE RELIEF OF HELEN J. HUDSON

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation for the relief of Mrs. Helen J. Hudson, an employee of the Sacramento Appeals Office of the Internal Revenue Service, which will deem her as an employee with 5 years of civilian service. I believe this extraordinary relief is necessary in order to permit Mrs. Hudson, a terminally ill cancer patient, to apply for and have approved a disability pension which would sustain her as she continues to fight for life.

Mrs. Hudson has been employed with the Internal Revenue Service since March 23, 1980. She has been a loyal and dependable employee whose performance has been exemplary. In January 1984, Mrs. Hudson was diagnosed as a terminally ill cancer patient; yet, she has continued to work as much as possible even while undergoing chemotherapy treatments. As a single parent and sole supporter of her 13-year-old son, Mrs. Hudson is dependent upon the income and medical benefits from her position with the Internal Revenue Service.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Hudson's health has continued to deteriorate and she may no longer be capable of maintaining her level of performance with the Internal Revenue Service. The Internal Revenue Service and Mrs. Hudson's coworkers have pursued all administrative measures at the county, State, and Federal levels to remedy this tragic situation, without success, and I commend their valiant efforts. Consequently, as Mrs. Hudson has exhausted her sick and annual leave, she will soom be faced without any means of financial support as she attempts to combat this evil disease for her life.

I have no doubt that Mrs. Hudson is a dedicated civil servant, deserving of this life-supporting compensation as has been demonstrated by her exemplary service to the IRS and the U.S. Navy. Mrs. Hudson meets all of the requirements for a disability retirement; yet she is being denied this compensation on the basis that she lacks 61 days of civilian service—the length of time that would fulfill the 5 years of civil service as required by the Federal Personnel regulations. Unfortunately, the medical prognosis remains that Helen may not live to complete this 5-year requirement.

It is indeed a tragedy to deny a dying woman disability retirement on the basis that she lacks less than 2 months of civil service, especially in light of the fact that she served her Government in the military for nearly 2 years. By making Helen Hudson eligible for disability retirement, we will be providing her the opportunity to enjoy the remaining months of her life at home with her son. I urge my colleagues to join me in this humanitarian effort and seek the expeditious consideration of this matter.●

DON'T CONFUSE NECESSARY EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I have received an excellent letter from my friend and constituent Fred Paxton, president of Paducah Newspapers, Inc., in Paducah, KY.

Fred Paxton, who is also president of WPSD-TV, the NBC station in Paducah, KY, and publisher of the Paducah Sun newspaper, writes to me regarding the proposals to change the tax treatment of so-called fringe benefits of employees.

Paxton, a former national NBC affiliates board chairman, is strongly opposed to including necessary medical insurance, short- and long-term disability programs and pension programs for retired employees in any congressional discussions about fringe benefits.

I believe my colleagues will be interested in Fred Paxton's timely comments, and his letter follows:

PADUCAH NEWSPAPERS, INC.,
Paducah, KY, December 18, 1984.

Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD,
Rayburn Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CARROLL: In discussing tax alternatives for 1985 and beyond, there is much talk about changing the treatment of so-called "fringe" benefits of employees.

If by this term they mean medical insurance, short- and long-term disability programs and pension programs for retired employees, I hope you won't consider these to be "fringe" benefits. I can assure you that our employees consider them to be necessary and vital ingredients of their lives, and that they have earned them through hard labor. We certainly agree. We provide these benefits willingly, because we think they are essential to family security and are just reward for faithful work.

It is very, very costly to maintain these programs. We ask our employees to share in some of these costs. In the medical insurance field alone, we have seen our costs increasing at the rate of approximately 50 percent a year for the past two years. Our employees sustain one-third of the premium costs, while our company shoulders the other two-thirds. It is a strain for both parties to meet 50 percent cost increases, yet who can do without medical insurance?

Please don't do anything to apply new tax burdens to these programs.

If it is your judgment that tax increases are necessary for our country, please vote to put them on our incomes, personal and corporate, where we can all see them. Please don't let your colleagues tamper with the privately-sponsored employee welfare programs which are working. Thank you for your consideration of these thoughts.

Sincerely,

FRED PAXTON, President.●

STATE CLEARINGHOUSES FOR MISSING CHILDREN

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation to amend the Missing Children's Assistance Act to provide matching grant funds—$2 million in fiscal year 1986 and $2 million in fiscal year 1987—for State law enforcement departments to set up State clearinghouses for missing children.

Each year countless numbers of children are abducted or run away. It is tragic that many of them are later found dead. And, for those children who are still missing, it is tragic that there is so little information available for law enforcement to use in locating them. Clearly, this problem is much too serious to ignore. We no longer can afford to be passive in protecting our children and simply hope that the problems of child abduction, and sexual and physical abuse will disappear.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the bill I am introducing today is a positive step we as Members of Congress can take to protect our children. It calls for statewide missing children clearinghouses to operate within State law enforcement agencies alone or in cooperation with other State agencies. It also encourages these State clearinghouses to educate parents, children, community agencies, and private organizations in ways to prevent abductions, to provide information to assist in locating and returning missing children; to publish a directory of State resources; to establish an in-State toll-free line to report a missing child as quickly as possible; and to act as a liaison for other public and private organizations to locate missing children.

As you may know, on June 13, 1984, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Youth opened in Washington, DC. The Center, initially funded by a grant from the Justice Department, coordinates and disseminates information to State and local law enforcement departments, public agencies and concerned parents.

While I am encouraged by the establishment of a national center, I believe it is essential that there be a link between all levels of law enforcement—local, State and national. We must provide State and local law enforcement with a cohesive and cooperative program to handle problems related to locating missing children.

Once the child is reported missing, the first 24 hours are critical. Parents' first reaction is to call their local police; therefore, it is vital that these law enforcement officers have ready access to an information file that will provide key statistics on the missing child and access to a system that will alert law enforcement agencies statewide. With the proper telecommunications system and trained personnel, State and local law enforcement can serve as an extremely effective frontline resource in the fight to locate and save our children.

Mr. Speaker, my home State of Florida is a leader in the nationwide effort to locate missing children. In 1982, on a shoestring budget, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement established an in-State missing children information clearinghouse. Since its inception, there have been impressive communication and cooperation between law enforcement personnel, public agencies, private organizations, and parents.

Several other States have followed Florida's example and set up similar networks. They too have found that these in-State clearinghouses can work closely with private organizations, public agencies, and parents to develop a comprehensive and uniform educational program designed to instruct parents and children of possible dangers.

After viewing Florida's program first hand, I am convinced that State clearinghouses are a vital key to locating missing children and that they should be implemented in all States if we are to successfully combat this tragic problem.

Mr. Speaker, I thank all my colleagues who have already joined with me today in being original cosponsors of my bill, and I strongly encourage the other Members of this body to join with us in cosponsoring this important legislation.●

FREEZE ALL FEDERAL SPENDING

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a resolution to freeze all spending in the unified Federal budget and to speed up the date at which Social Security is moved off-budget. Implementing this resolution would begin bringing the deficits down and getting a handle on our fiscal policies.

Without a spending freeze we will be piling $200 billion a year onto our national debt. Unless we get serious about deficits, we can expect a future of high interest rates, more record trade deficits, more farm foreclosures, and construction slumps. But I believe in busting the deficit without misusing Social Security funds. President Reagan was absolutely right when he said that Social Security has "nothing to do with balancing a budget or erasing or lowering the deficit."

The right kind of budget freeze can yield handsome dividends. A flat freeze on spending could trim the deficit by nearly $30 billion in fiscal year 1986 and by about $400 billion, if pursued over the next 4 fiscal years. This will save a lot of money and cut the deficit by two-thirds.

A 1-year freeze only puts the brakes on. But it offers a fair, effective, and winnable way to start reining in our runaway deficits. The freeze I propose is also flexible, since it permits program increases wherever fully offset by cuts in other programs or revenue increases. But it is not flexible enough to let defense spending slip through the cracks. Since $300 billion defense bills account for 30 percent of the total budget, it is absolutely essential that we freeze the Pentagon's checkbook.

But we must resist the temptation to balance the budget with Social Security trust funds. That revenue represents the employee and matching contributions of future retirees—not general revenue for any program running short. We must not break the Government's contract with working people and senior citizens.

A change that I successfully included in the Social Security Amendments of 1983 already mandates that Social Security be removed from the unified budget by fiscal year 1983. My resolution simply accelerates the off-budget treatment of Social Security trust funds to fiscal year 1986.

We must tear up the Government's credit card without breaking out promises to the holders of Social Security cards.

We are long past due in acting on the budget responsibility and seriously. A few years ago a budget freeze might have seemed radical; now it seems not only practical, but the only way out. If we don't act today, it will be that much harder to act tomorrow.●

THE IDEALS OF SCOUTING ARE PERSONIFIED BY JOHN WILLIAMSON OF PERTH AMBOY, NJ

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as you and every other Member in this Chamber is well aware, 1985 represents the 75th anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America. This is an occasion for us, and for all Americans, to reflect on the positive contributions which Scouting has made to many individuals and to the fabric of our Nation, as a whole.

Within the context of this historic occasion, I would like to direct the attention of my colleagues to an individual who has dedicated his life to Scouting. His story is a remarkable one, showing integrity and commitment of the kind rarely seen.

John Williamson is the scoutmaster of Troop No. 15 in Perth Amboy. He first became involved in Scouting after he left the Navy in 1923. He could not become involved earlier, as he grew up in the hills of central Pennsylvania where Scouting had not yet reached. His first involvement was through the Simpson Methodist Church in Perth Amboy. By 1928, he had become an Eagle Scout himself, earning 50 merit badges; far more than the minimum of 21 which is necessary for such an honor.

In his 60 years in Scouting, Mr. Williamson has had 30 of the young men under his charge become Eagle Scouts—an indication of his ability as a leader and a teacher. He describes this record as his proudest achievement in Scouting. He has traveled throughout the country in connection with his Scouting activities and has attended six Boy Scout jamborees over the years.

Mr. Speaker, John Williamson has been a great Scout, a great leader in his community, and a great American. I am proud to salute him today.●

THE HEART OF RURAL AMERICA

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, those of us who grew up in small towns know that in each such community there are several people who are at the heart of the life of those towns. These men and women often never hold any official position in town government. They don't always own the local bank or the local grocery store.

They are the people, however, who spend a lifetime serving others in the community, whose concern for their fellow citizens helps build the bonds which make life in small towns so special.

Charlotte Harrison Oberg is one such person whose active interest in others and in her community has made life fuller and happier for her neighbors in Crosby, MN, and the surrounding area in Crow Wing County.

For over 40 years, Mrs. Oberg has written a column for the Crosby-Ironton Courier, the weekly newspaper which serves a large part of Crow Wing County. Her columns, written under the pseudonym "Dick," kept readers up to date on the comings and goings of their friends and neighbors. Her columns are an integral part of the memories which those who have lived in Crosby-Ironton carry with them to this day.

As part of this tribute to Mrs. Oberg, I would like to include for the RECORD one of Mrs. Oberg's more memorable columns. As a resident of a small city in northern Minnesota, I hope that the Members of this House—be they small-town raised or residents of the Nation's great cities—will enjoy Mrs. Oberg's column.

OLDEST MINNESOTA TEACHER RETURNS HOME—RACHEL RODERICK

On Sept. 6, 1913, a very small and very scared little girl bravely clutched her lunch bucket in one hand, a new pencil and tablet in the other, smiled a tearful goodbye to Mother and Dad then trudged down a country road for her first day in school. To say she was frightened is putting it mildly. Just imagine an only child who had never been away from Mama more than two hours facing the task of spending seven hours with 17 other kids and a strange woman.

How vividly those first few days remain in my memory and the vision of Rachel Roderick's face has always been etched in my heart. She wasn't beautiful as beauty is determined today but she had a beautiful smile and her light brown hair was always neat and pretty. She wore glasses but they didn't detract one iota from the expressiveness of her eyes. I thought she dressed beautifully, mostly in white blouses and dark skirts but today I know the most beautiful thing about her was her understanding heart. It wasn't long until I would just as soon be with teacher as Mama. (I just suddenly realized we start losing our children the first day they go to school).

Rachel played the organ we had in school and she soon discovered that I had a great love for music and when she mentioned it to my Dad he bought me an organ because I had such good marks in school. She taught me music until she left our school the year I finished the fourth grade.

Time has a way of erasing many things from our memory and I must confess I don't remember many of my grade school teachers but somehow the memory of that first teacher lingered on. Over 45 years had passed when we bought a used furniture and antique shop in Crosby. One evening when we were buying near Okassippi the lady told me her neighbor had some antiques she wished to sell. Having a few minutes to spare I stopped at the designated house and when the door opened there stood Rachel Roderick.

I found a happy, energetic woman just a shade under 80 years of age who had continued to teach rural schools until four years before. Consolidation took away her closest school which was two miles away and since she never owned a car she had to quit. Fifty-four years of her life had been teaching us readin', 'riting, and 'rithmetic.

She taught her first school in 1903-04 and during her 50 years of teaching had taught in 40 districts in Crow Wing County and one in Aitkin County. Her monthly salary started at $30 a month in 1903 and she had worked up to $235 a month in 1955-56.

How interesting it would be if one could figure out the miles she has walked in her lifetime over hill and vale, through trails only a horse used, across lakes and meadows. She tells of how the timber wolves would sometimes start following her when she was a little late getting home but swears that as long as one keeps walking and shows no fear, they never molest you.

Her record of attendance was fabulous. She hardly ever missed a day of school and once she was voted the teacher of the year, an honor she truly deserved.

In 1967 her sister, Pearl, developed cancer and Rachel was called to Thousand Oaks, California, to care for her, which she did until her demise. With the youngest brother, Ira, still there she assumed the care of the house and cooking for him until shortly before he passed away in 1973.

Then she was the last member of a family of eight children and since she had fulfilled her obligation to all her loved ones, she had a great desire to come back to Minnesota so in 1974 she returned to the area that she had given most of her life to.

At the age 93 her favorite activity is walking and she can easily walk a mile a day when weather permits.

When she returned to Minnesota many of her old pupils came to see her some from clear across the U.S. Three of the Woods family that Rachel had taught and myself spend the day together in the fall of 1975. Rachel had boarded with them when she taught their school and they remembered there were 11 people living in one room. In order to give the teacher a little privacy they hung sheets up as partitions in one small corner. All the furniture in the room was one bed. Rachel's trunk served as clothes closet, dressing table and seat to sit down to dress your feet.

One little girl had to sleep with Rachel and they all remembered that when the baby was sick, Rachel took a turn walking the floor with her at night so Mrs. Woods could get some sleep. During the visit one of the girls said, "Everybody loved Rachel." What a lovely tribute to a woman who had spent her life for the welfare of others.●

INTRODUCTION OF OCS REVENUE SHARING LEGISLATION

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill that will share Outer Continental Shelf revenues with coastal States. The bill is similar to one that I introduced in the 97th Congress. The modifications that have been made reflect subsequent concerns expressed in regard to other OCS revenue sharing measures.

OCS revenue sharing is a program that has consistently been supported by the House. In the 98th Congress, we passed an OCS revenue sharing bill three times, only to see it defeated each time by opposition from the administration in the other body. I have tried to go part way in meeting the administration's concerns; I expect them to do an equal amount of compromising.

OCS revenue sharing is not a Government windfall for coastal States. Rather, it recognizes that a coastal State can be affected by activities occurring offshore. In the case of onshore mineral leasing, we provide States with Federal funds to offset any impacts resulting from exploration and development. No similar program exists with respect to coastal States and offshore development, even though the impacts can be as large or larger. Sharing of OCS revenues with coastal States—and especially with affected coastal communities—is a sound way to address this issue.

Two important points about this bill should be brought to the Members' attention. First, the bill ties shared revenue directly to OCS leasing. In the formula for sharing OCS revenue, the bill provides that 85 percent of the funds accruing to a particular State are based on the OCS activity occurring adjacent to that State. The bill is not a giveaway; it does not seek to fund Federal programs by alternative means; it simply allows States and local communities to receive funds to offset impacts that occur from OCS activity.

Second, the bill does not attempt to solve the legal questions that have come under section 8(g) of the OCS Lands Act. Under the provisions of this section, the Federal Government is required to share with a State the revenues of a common pool of oil located in both State and Federal waters. Under my bill, tracts leased within 3 miles of a State's territorial waters will not be counted in the general revenue-sharing formula. Thus, both affected States and the Federal Government are free to pursue their section 8(g) claims in the courts, as they are now doing.

I am including a section-by-section summary of the bill as introduced. I commend it to my fellow Members and ask for your support:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE COASTAL RESOURCE AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT GRANT ACT OF 1985

SECTION 1. It is the short title, "The Coastal Resource and Economic Development Grant Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Definitions. This section defines a "coastal state" to include the same states as the Coastal Zone Management Act. All of the states are eligible for funds under this Act.

The Governor of a coastal state or his designee is identified as the recipient of monies from the fund as are the individual coastal communities of a coastal state.

Coastal energy facilities are identified to include coal, oil, electricity, and related equipment and facilities.

Secretary of the Treasury is identified as the Administrator of the fund.

SEC. 3. This section directs that the Secretary of the Treasury establish a Coastal Resource and Economic Development Grant Fund in the Treasury of the United States. The Fund shall be made up of three percent of annual OCS revenues, with a minimum of $150 million up to a maximum of $350 million to be deposited annually.

SEC. 4. This section directs that grants be paid to coastal states, establishes the formula for disbursement of these funds, directs how these funds are to be spent by the coastal states, and creates certain conditions and requirements for receipt and expenditure of monies by the states.

The formula for determining the amount of money a specific state may be paid is made up of two categories. First, 85 percent of revenues to be received by a state is based on leasing and production that occurs between 3 and 250 miles of a state's seaward boundary; second, 15 percent of the amount of revenues to be received by a state is based upon the amount of energy facilities located in a state's coastal zone. [The amount of OCS bonus and royalty (subsection (b)) to be received by a coastal state is based on a maximum of 2.8 percent of bonus monies for tracts leased three miles from a state's seaward boundary decreased to 50 percent of the 2.8 percent for those tracts leased at 250 miles of a state's lesed seaward boundary. The maximum royalties that may be received is 4.2 percent of total royalties from production from a tract three miles from a coastal state's seaward boundary, and is reduced to 50 percent of that for a tract 250 miles from a state's seaward boundary (Section 4(b)).]

The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay 50 percent of a state's allocation to the Governor of that coastal state, and 50 percent of the coastal state's allocation shall be paid to units of local coastal government (subsection (b)). No state may offset the payment of state funds to a coastal community that they have been receiving because they are now receiving Federal funds. In addition, a state with an approved Coastal Zone Management Plan cannot receive less than $2.5 million annually (Section 4(f)).

The payment to the Governor and to the units of local coastal governments shall be included in the revenue sharing check received currently under the "State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act of 1972" (Section 4(d)(2)). Factors for determining local communities' share of revenues utilized by that Act shall also apply to the disbursement of funds under this Act.

From the monies received by the Governor of a coastal state, one-fourth must be used for fisheries development and scientific research (Section 4(h)). In addition, the state must match (in cash or kind) one-fourth of the amount of monies paid to the Governor of a coastal state (Section 4(i)).

Funds for local coastal communities in the unorganized borough of the State of Alaska shall be paid to the Governor of that state instead of to the local communities (Section 4(h)(3)).

The Secretary of the Treasury shall ensure that states spend the monies paid under this Act for the purposes of this Act which will include but not be limited to fish and wildlife conservation, port development, flood control and navigation, erosion control, shore stabilization planning, and resource development planning. If a state spends money on other than these programs, they shall return that money to the General Fund of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Treasury may withhold that amount from next year's payment to that state (Section 4(j)).

Section 5 of the Act requires the annual appropriation of OCS revenues up to $350 million per year to be deposited in the Coastal Resource and Economic Development Grant Act Fund.

SUMMARY

This Act establishes a fund in the Treasury to share OCS revenues from bonuses and royalties with coastal states because a state and coastal community may be impacted by such energy development. For this reason, 85 percent of the monies received by a coastal state (to be divided 50 percent with the coastal communities, 50 percent with the Governor of the state) shall be based on actual OCS activity, with the larger percentage being paid for activity that occurs three miles from a state's seaward boundary and a lesser percentage being paid for activity that occurs 250 miles from a state's seaward boundary. Fifteen percent of the revenues received by a coastal state shall be determined by the amount of coastal-related energy facilities located in that state's coastal zone.

A state with an approved Coastal Zone Management Plan shall receive a minimum of $2.5 million annually, this combined with the above formula shall ensure that all coastal states (including the Great Lakes, Trust Territories, and other islands) shall receive revenues under this Act.

The Act requires a state to expend the money on fisheries development, port development, estuary management, and other economic and environmental programs, or the Secretary of the Treasury shall require them to repay those funds to the Treasury of the United States.

Any monies remaining in this fund at the end of the fiscal year, regardless of the reason, shall be returned to the General Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The issue of 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act is left as a separate issue because the formula under Section 4(b) of this Act begins with tracts that are three miles from a state's seaward boundary. Under 8(g) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, the drainage tracts for the sharing of bonuses and royalties by the Federal Government with states are for tracts that are within three miles of a state's seaward boundary.●

YOUTH OPPORTUNITY WAGE

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced a bill today that will provide assistance for unemployed teenagers. According to the latest U.S. Department of Labor statistics, there are 8.1 million people out of work today, representing 7.2 percent of our workforce. The teenage unemployment rate is better than twice the amount at 18.8 percent, and for black teenagers, the rate is a devastating 42.1 percent. While the overall unemployment rate has dropped recently, the rate for black teenagers has grown in quantum leaps—from 10 percent in 1948 to over 42 percent today. The unemployment rate for black teenagers has declined from a high of 50 percent several years ago, but the racial disparity still exists.

A basic law of economics is that the quantity of labor demanded is inversely related to the wage rate. When a minimum wage is established at a level above the one that would be determined by market forces, employment opportunities are restricted for the least productive workers by pricing their services out of the market. The resulting higher labor costs may exceed the value of some workers' services, causing disemployment among these workers. Indeed, the minimum wage may benefit those workers who retain their jobs at the higher wage, but those who lose their jobs or are not hired at all clearly are made worse off. Some unemployed workers may seek jobs in uncovered sectors, where minimum wage laws pose no barriers to employment, but in so doing, increase the supply of labor, exerting downward pressure on wage rates in those areas. In addition, as coverage has expanded, fewer jobs have become available in uncovered sectors for displaced workers to turn to.

Surely everyone can agree that there is a serious youth unemployment problem, contributing to crime rates and growth in welfare rolls, and that something must be done. There is, indeed, one obvious step we can take to attack teenage unemployment without embarking on an expensive Government jobs program. We can enact a youth opportunity wage. This legislation would allow youths of 19 years and under to be paid at 85 percent of the minimum wage for the initial year of their employment. After this training period, such employees would be paid at least the full minimum wage.

The Federal minimum wage has been extolled as a moral effort to assure every worker a decent wage. In reality, it prices many low-skilled workers out of the job market, and hits hardest at the teenage worker who is likely to be low-skilled because of age, immaturity, and lack of job experience. Most people assume that minimum wage benefits accrue to the needy, yet the Minimum Wage Study Commission's report reveals that less than one-third of an increase in the minimum wage would go to families with pretax earnings of $10,000 or less.

A youth opportunity wage would encourage private employment, with its hopes of job permanence. In fact, studies have shown that a 15-percent wage differential would create a minimum of 100,000 jobs at the current unemployment rate. Also, contrary to the arguments of some, experience in other nations with a youth differential indicates that older workers would not be displaced. Rather, business would be encouraged to retain the marginal, entry level jobs that would otherwise be lost in times of high unemployment or as the minimum wage increases. And this initiative would not cost the taxpayers a dime. Instead, it would save money as we move young people into the productive labor force.

Mr. Speaker, America's young people are anxious and willing to work, but without a youth opportunity wage, teenagers will continue to bear the burden of high unemployment.●

THE 99TH CONGRESS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 9, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE 99TH CONGRESS

The new Congress is underway, but the biggest issue that it faces is not new. Once again, as it has in recent years, the same question will dominate the session: can the annual deficit, now exceeding $200 billion, be reduced? The 99th Congress will have before it most of the old and familiar problems left by its predecessor. Legislators face not only the deficit, but also a pile of important bills that nearly passed last year, and a clutch of major decisions that the last Congress ducked.

The President and congressional leadership agree that reducing the deficit is the top legislative priority. They acknowledge that the deficit is harmful to the economy, and that something should be done to get federal spending under control. Such a cooperative note is not unimportant, but neither is it sufficient to assure a significant reduction in the deficit. Although the problem is easy to identify and the danger of inaction is increasingly recognized, it will be difficult to get agreement on how to go about reducing the deficit, where to cut the budget, how deep to make the cuts, and what changes, if any, should be made in the tax structure. There will be sharp clashes on military and domestic spending proposals alike.

Tax simplification, including income tax cuts financed by the elimination of many popular deductions, will be another important budget issue in the 99th Congress. Chances for real tax reform appear slim unless the President pushes hard for it. Leaders in both the House and Senate have expressed reluctance to move ahead with tax reform if it gets in the way of deficit reduction. Members of Congress believe that deficit reduction should be the first order of business, but it would be a mistake to count tax reform proposals out. After the spending fight is resolved, these proposals are almost certain to be considered.

The 98th Congress left an enormous amount of uncompleted and urgent work to the 99th Congress in areas other than the budget. Among the most important foreign affairs and defense issues facing this Congress will be money for antigovernment guerrillas in Nicaragua, continued production of the MX missile, racial segregation in South Africa, and famine elsewhere in Africa.

Although the size and structure of the defense budget probably will be the prominent defense issue this year, Congress also must act to renew or lift the ban on anti-satellite missile tests in space and decide what we should spend on anti-missile defense during the next fiscal year. The sale of weapons to Arab countries in the Mideast certainly will be controversial. Congress will favor the President's request to boost aid to Israel, which is suffering its worst economic crisis ever, and it will take up a comprehensive immigration reform bill once again.

Among the most important domestic items that the 99th Congress will consider is the farm program, including price supports, credits, and research. Also on the agenda are: restructuring rural electric and telephone loan systems, legislation on interstate banking and expanded powers for financial institutions, and proposals on deregulation of banking and reforms to prevent the growing number of bank failures. Business practices involving corporate takeovers and mergers will be studied. Congress also may consider legislation to allow retailers to charge up to five percent for credit card purchases. In transportation, Congress will consider the final sale of Conrail, raising the national speed limit to 65 miles per hour on some highways, and the release of federal highway construction money urgently needed by the states.

Action on social and educational issues will include scrutiny of college student aid and educational reforms aimed at upgrading schools, cuts in Medicare spending, reconsideration of a vetoed biomedical research bill, subsidies for medical centers in low-income or rural areas, easing drug export restrictions, and a ban on saccharin as a food additive. Certain federal nutrition programs, such as food stamps and school lunch initiatives, need to be reauthorized. The President may try to reduce or eliminate housing and community development programs and probably will try again to gain support for a plan to create tax-free enterprise zones in inner cities. Civil rights advocates will continue to press for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, stronger civil rights laws, and legislation to end sex-based discrimination in insurance and pensions. Presidential proposals to cut federal pay and restrict eligibility for veterans' health care will not gain easy passage in Congress.

Pending activity on energy and the environment would open new natural gas generating plants, speed up building and licensing of nuclear power plants, renew the Clean Water Act, rewrite the "Superfund" toxic waste cleanup legislation, overhaul the safe drinking water law, control atmospheric pollution, and address the problem of acid rain. We will see proposals for new water projects and an attempt to regulate commercial development of coastal areas.

My guess is that President Reagan will not win many easy legislative victories this year—certainly not as many as he did in the initial year of his first term. His landslide election victory will strengthen his hand, especially in the first few months of 1985, but the signs of a blissful honeymoon with Congress are difficult to spot. He is a lame-duck President, and he faces a new independence, even feistiness, among Republican leaders. In recent days, they have taken the lead in proposing larger cuts in military spending, cancellation of the MX missile, suspension of aid to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, and alternatives to the President's anticipated budget. Many legislators in both political parties are advocating some kind of across-the-board budget freeze.

All in all, it is an agenda packed with potential problems, and it all adds up to a contentious and lively 99th Congress.●

LEGISLATION TO REFORM THE FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION LAWS

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I will introduce legislation Thursday to make major reforms in the Federal unemployment compensation laws. Specifically, my legislation would liberalize entitlement to extended benefits [EB], provide less confusing rules for implementation of the Federal Supplemental Compensation [FSC] Program, and make two minor amendments to current law dealing with the treatment of unemployed individuals.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress in 1983 extended the current FSC Program until March 1985. That extension was partially in response to an administration request, and in response to the continuing problems faced by the long-term unemployed. The Congress' action, however, fails to address the fundamental problems with unemployment compensation programs in general.

There are currently two basic programs which provide extended unemployment compensation to individuals who are out of work after they exhaust their entitlement to State unemployment compensation: Extended benefits [EB] and FSC. My legislation addresses both areas.

Under present law, an individual who has exhausted his State unemployment benefits is allowed to collect an additional 13 weeks of EB if his State is "triggered on" the program. The EB Program is paid for one-half out of Federal revenues and one-half out of the State unemployment trust fund. A State is "triggered on" the EB Program if either of the following are true:

First, the insured unemployment rate [IUR] is 6 percent, or,

Second, the IUR is 5 percent, and is 20 percent higher than the same 13-week period the year before.

At the present time, only Puerto Rico pays extended benefits.

There are, however, many problems with the so-called EB trigger. One major problem is that in the event of a continued high rate of unemployment, many States begin to trigger off the program, as evidenced by the fact that only Puerto Rico is presently paying EB.

Entitlement to EB is based on a State's insured unemployment rate [IUR], which is a fraction representing the number of individuals in a State claiming State benefits divided by the number of individuals working in jobs in the State which are covered by the unemployment program. Thus, if a State has 25,000 claimants for State benefits and 500,000 employees statewide, the IUR in the State would be 5 percent. Unfortunately, as individuals begin to exhaust their entitlement to State benefits, the numerator in the fraction becomes smaller, thus lowering the IUR—even though many individuals remain unemployed. This effect is even more dramatic during a prolonged recession, where the IUR becomes an inaccurate measure of a State's unemployment rate.

Prior to 1981—specifically, prior to passage of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981—the numerator in the fraction included recipients of EB, thus extending the time before which a State could trigger off EB. Returning to the prereconciliation rules, however, does not seem desirable, as a State could then theoretically never trigger off EB.

My legislation addresses both problems. It would amend the formula for determining entitlement for EB by linking payments to a new base average unemployment rate [BAUR], which would be the average of a State's IUR and total unemployment rate. For example, if a State's IUR were 3 percent and its total unemployment rate were 9 percent, its BAUR for purposes of determining eligibility for EB would be 6 percent.

As well, the triggers for determining eligibility for EB would be amended to the following:

First, the BAUR would have to equal 5.5 percent, or,

Second, the BAUR would have to equal 4.5 percent, and be 20 percent higher than the equivalent 13-week period in the previous year.

My legislation would also address the possibility of using sub-State triggers to determine eligibility for extended benefits. This would be done because a State may have an overall low unemployment rate with pockets of unemployment that greatly exceed the lower State level. Under my legislation, the Department of Labor would be required to compile unemployment statistics—both the IUR and TUR—on unemployment in counties. The report would have to be completed within 6 months of enactment. After this report is completed, the BAUR of each county would be calculated, and EB would be paid in those counties that meet the EB criteria noted above. As a general rule, an unemployed individual would be eligible for EB if the county in which he or she last worked met or exceeded the EB triggers.

My legislation would also reform the FSC Program, which will expire at the end of March. Under my legislation, the FSC Program would trigger on at any time when the national BAUR was at least 6 percent. This trigger provision would end the confusion that usually surrounds congressional attempts to extend the program. The Department of Labor would be required to calculate the national BAUR monthly after March 31, 1985, and the program would last until 3 weeks after the national BAUR dropped below 6 percent. In no case would the program last for less than 13 weeks.

Benefits under any FSC extension would be paid as follows: 14 weeks in States with a 7 percent BAUR or above; 12 weeks in States with a BAUR of 6 to 6.99 percent; 10 weeks in States with a BAUR of 5 to 5.99 percent; 8 weeks in States with a BAUR of 4 to 4.99 percent; and 6 weeks in all other States.

The bill also contains a reachback provision, so that individuals who had exhausted entitlement to FSC on or before the end of the last extension of FSC could receive additional weeks of benefits, up to a maximum of 6 weeks. Under the rules in my bill, individuals who have entitlement to FSC remaining, or have exhausted all entitlement, could receive additional weeks of benefits up to one-half of their new entitlement. In no event, however, could an individual who had entitlement remaining receive more weeks of FSC benefits after the beginning of the new program than the maximum number of basic weeks of FSC payable in the State as of that date.

In addition, the legislation also contains a guarantee against benefit reductions. Under the bill, the maximum number of FSC weeks payable in a State will not be reduced more frequently than every 3 months, and will not be reduced more than 2 weeks in any 3-week period. Qualified unemployed workers will continue to be eligible for at least the number of FSC weeks to which they were entitled at the time they first qualified for FSC, even though the maximum number of basic FSC weeks payable in the State decreases because of a reduction in the State's BAUR.

Finally, my legislation makes two minor amendments to current law. First, it allows an individual to withdraw money from his individual retirement account [IRA] before age 59½ if the individual has, in the preceding 12-month period, exhausted all rights to Federal and State unemployment compensation. Under present law, an individual generally is subject to a penalty tax of 10 percent of any distribution from an IRA. This provision is identical to a Senate provision in the Social Security Amendments of 1983, but was deleted in conference.

Second, my bill would allow States the option of denying unemployment compensation to nonprofessional employees of educational institutions during the months in which they are out of work. This provision would not require States to deny these benefits, as under current law.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will be an important reform of the unemployment laws in our Nation. I plan to share it with the members of the Ways and Means Committee, and hope that they will consider my ideas as they begin consideration of unemployment legislation in the coming months.●

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 67th anniversary of the proclamation of Ukraine's independence from the Russian Empire on January 22, 1918.

Ukrainians and Americans are bound by a common respect for human rights and desire for liberty and freedom. In fact, the Ukrainian revolution was very much like our own country's revolution in 1776 in that its ultimate objective was freedom and independence from colonial subjugation—in the Ukraine's case from Communist Russia.

For 3½ years—from March 1917 to the end of 1920—the Ukrainian people struggled valiantly to preserve their hard-won independence. But surrounded by predatory and imperialist-minded neighbors, alone and unaided, they succumbed to the superior physical forces of their enemies.

Under Communist Russia, Ukrainians have suffered the most inhuman treatment and persecution:

Since the incorporation of the Ukraine into the Soviet Union in 1922, Ukrainians have been made victims of genocide through man-made famines, executions, arrests and deportations;

They have suffered systematic Russification of their language and educational system, and obliteration of the Ukrainian national identity;

Their culture has been suppressed and their history and literature have been distorted; and

Ukrainians have suffered religious persecution, economic exploitation and destruction of their political structure.

We, therefore, mark this anniversary today both to pay tribute to those who fought and died for Ukrainian independence and to remind Americans, and those throughout the Free World, of the grave consequences of Soviet domination.

Our brothers in the Ukraine must always be able to look to the United States as a beacon of hope and support that one day they will again be free. Our dream for a free and independent Ukraine will never die.●

SOLAR ENERGY TAX CREDIT EXTENSION LEGISLATION

HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I am planning to reintroduce legislation which would extend the business and residential tax credits for solar installations through the year 1990.

Congress first enacted solar tax credits in 1978 and present law now allows a residential solar tax credit of 40 percent for solar equipment. On the commercial end, current law permits a 15-percent credit of the total cost of the installation. These provisions are due to expire December 31, 1985.

The solar industry is very new with most of these businesses having come into existence after the 1973 oil embargo. It has made an impressive beginning in building acceptance in the marketplace against competing fuels which continue to enjoy subsidies. In addition to creating new jobs and fostering new businesses, further development of the solar industry will lessen our dependency on foreign sources of energy.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I intend to introduce would extend what I believe is a vital tax incentive. Specifically, this measure would extend the residential solar credits through 1990. In order to reduce the revenue loss and to provide for a gradual end to the subsidy, it provides for an annual 5-percent reduction in the credit level beginning in 1986. The credit for photovoltaics would remain at 40 percent through 1990 due to special needs, but since over 95 percent of the solar residential applications are for heating and cooling, the cost to the Treasury will be minimized. There is also a $6,000 credit limitation on domestic hot water systems as another provision to reduce revenue loss.

The solar investment tax credits would be extended at their current level of 15 percent through 1990. Because of their newness and, hence, need for special incentives, photovoltaics and high temperature solar industrial process heat and electricity systems would receive a 25-percent credit through 1990.

Taken together, the provisions of this bill represent a reasonable and cost-efficient response to the dual national goals of encouraging the development of secure, alternative energy resources at affordable prices, and reducing the Federal deficit. I hope my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring and actively supporting the extension of these solar energy credits. The text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to extend the residential energy credit with respect to solar renewable energy source expenditures, with declining percentages of credit, through 1990, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(b) SOLAR HOT WATER SYSTEMS AND ACTIVE SPACE HEATING SYSTEMS MUST MEET CERTAIN ADDITIONAL STANDARDS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (5) of section 23(c) of such Code (defining renewable energy source property) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C), by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (D) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and ", and by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

(2) Subparagraph (B) of section 23(b)(5) of such Code (relating to carryforward of unused credit) is amended to read as follows:

"(B) LIMITATION ON CARRYFORWARDS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in clause (ii), no amount may be carried under subparagraph (A) to any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1987.

"(ii) CERTAIN SOLAR CREDITS.—In the case of a carryforward allocable to solar property (as defined in subsection (b)(2)(B)), '1992' shall be substituted for '1987' in clause (i). For purposes of applying the preceding sentence, a carryforward shall be treated as allocable to solar property to the extent of the credit under this section allocable to such property for the taxable year in which such carryforward arose."

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985.

SEC. 2. AMENDMENTS RELATING TO ENERGY INVESTMENT CREDIT FOR SOLAR PROPERTY.

(a) INCREASE AND EXTENSION OF CREDIT FOR CERTAIN SOLAR PROPERTY.—

"(viii) Low temperature solar property.—Property described in subparagraph (F)(ii).	15 percent	Jan. 1, 1986	Dec. 31, 1990.
"(ix) Other solar property.—Solar property other than low temperature property.	25 percent	Jan. 1, 1986	Dec. 31, 1990."

(2) DEFINITIONS.—Paragraph (2) of section 46(b) of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F) DEFINITIONS RELATING TO SOLAR PROPERTY.—For purposes of subparagraph (A)—

"(i) SOLAR PROPERTY.—The term 'solar property' means equipment which uses solar energy—

"(I) to generate electricity,

"(II) to heat or cool (or provide hot water for use in) a structure, or

"(III) to provide solar process heat.

"(ii) LOW TEMPERATURE SOLAR PROPERTY.—

"(I) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subclause (II), the term 'low temperature solar property' means property which is solar property solely by reason of subparagraph (B) of section 48(l)(4).

"(II) EQUIPMENT PROVIDING HOT WATER.—Property used to provide hot water shall be treated as low temperature solar property only if such property is designed to provide hot water at not more than 300 degrees Fahrenheit."

"(b) AFFIRMATIVE COMMITMENT RULE.—Paragraph (2) of section 46(b) of such Code is amended by adding after subparagraph (f) the following new subparagraph:

"(G) AFFIRMATIVE COMMITMENT RULE FOR CERTAIN SOLAR PROPERTY.—For purposes of applying the energy percentage contained in clause (ix) of subparagraph (A) with respect to property which is part of a project with a normal construction period of 2 years or more (within the meaning of subsection (d)(2)(A)(i)), 'December 31, 1993' shall be substituted for 'December 31, 1990' if the requirements of clauses (i) and (ii) of subparagraph (C) are met with respect to such project. For purposes of the preceding sentence, subparagraph (C) shall be applied by substituting—

"(i) 'January 1, 1991' for 'January 1, 1983', and

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. William Rutland, who is retiring after a distinguished career in the Air Force. McClellan Air Force Base, in my congressional district, has been privileged to have Bill Rutland in its service as executive assistant to the commander for the past 4 years.

Bill has not only been an asset to McClellan but has taken an active part in community life in Sacramento. He served on the Sacramento Unified School District Board of Education for several years and was its president in 1970. He is a member of several civic and fraternal organizations including Rotary International, the American Red Cross, Sacramento Children's Home Society, and the Del Oro Girl Scouts Council.

Bill has come a long way from his birthplace in Cherokee, AL. He has built an exemplary career in the Air Force step by step, through hard work and dedication to the task at hand. The Air Force Logistics Command, and McClellan Air Force Base in particular, will sorely miss him, and we wish him and his family all the best in the years to come. Thank you.●

KNOWLEDGE FOR A BETTER WORLD

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, shortly before Christmas the University of Nebraska-Lincoln held its winter commencement exercises. Featured speaker at the event was Ambassador Zhang Wenjin of the People's Republic of China.

I have had the personal privilege of meeting with Ambassador Zhang and consider him to be a very able and distinguished representative of his country. With the growing importance of the People's Republic of China to the world and our own country, I was very pleased that the Ambassador agreed to address a university audience in the heartland of America.

The day also carried with it a bit of historical significance. University officials conferred an honorary degree upon the Ambassador—the first I understand he has received.

It is with great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I insert the text of the Ambassador's speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

KNOWLEDGE FOR A BETTER WORLD

Mr. Chancelor, Mr. President, Ladies and Gentleman, it is a privilege and honor for me to witness history today. This commencement is the reflection of the excellence of your university, the crystalization of the wisdom of the faculty and the boundiful reward of the loving care of the parents. But above all, my dear young friends, it is a monument to your hard work and outstanding academic achievements.

From here you will proudly go to the world out there—to claim your own place and build your own happy life. But I also see clearly on your shoulders the responsibility to create a better world—a world free from poverty, disease, social injustice and the danger of war. To prefer a plateau of prosaic safety or a terrain of peaks and valleys is your choice. But in choosing to work for the common good and a better world, you will ultimately find a sense of self-fulfillment and a meaningful way of life.

Knowledge is a vitally important tool for bringing about a better world. College education may have given you an intelligent approach to knowledge, but knowledge itself is a long, mighty river. Rough and turbulent, it only allows those brave and indefatigable to rise above the flow and reach a point where they can enjoy a full view of the horizon.

China was once leading this herioc voyage with her brilliant ancient civilization. But owning to various historical reasons, she is now lagging behind the scientifically-advanced nations such as the United States. In our current efforts to modernize China, we need to learn from you while sharing with you our own tested knowledge. With the combination of Chinese and American resources and their wisdom old and new, the two countries will gain much more strength in navigating and choosing direction. The wind is up and the current is swift. Let us join hands and press ahead in this enternal river of knowledge.

The Chinese and American peoples are so different in their values, cultures, histories and political systems, yet they are both great peoples—dynamic, hardworking and peaceloving. They came to know and like each other a long time ago.

We will never forget the thousands of Chinese laborers who came to this country more than a century ago. They mingled the sweat of their brows with that of other immigrants and, together, they built the first American transcontinental railroad. We are pleased to note that today Chinese Americans are contributing even more greatly to the various aspects of American life.

We will always remember our American friends who came to China when the hours were dark. Their warm support and kind assistance went a long way in helping us repulse foreign aggression and usher in a new era represented by the founding of the People's Republic in 1949. Later, they worked hard for Sino-American mutual understanding and normalization of relations. We are happy to find that today more Americans are engaged in a host of worthy endeavors to the benefit of both our peoples.

Sino-American mutual understanding and friendship have now reached a much higher elevation. Our exchanges and cooperation in the economic, scientific-technological and cultural fields have made big strides forward. Together, the Chinese and American people will be in a much stronger position to help make this world a better, safer place.

Young people are like the rising sun. You represent the future of the world and our important bilateral relations. To be with you, people in the most creative and vigorous stage of life, makes me feel young and energetic. I am most grateful to the University of Nebraska for its decision to confer on me an honorary degree of humane letters, which I regard, above all, as an important gesture of your sincere friendship to the Chinese people and strong commitment to Sino-American cultural exchanges. This high honor will spur me on in exerting all my efforts for the blossoming of these important exchanges.

Across the length and breadth of our two vast countries, tens of thousands of Chinese and American students are now living and studying together. It is my sincere hope that more Nebraskan sons and daughters will go to my country for academic study and exchanges. Out of mutual understanding grows a strong bond of friendship—a friendship which has already struck root in Lincoln, across the cornhusker state and all over the land.

Sitting among you in this hall are two graduate students from the People's Republic of China, who are also going to receive their M.A. degrees today. At present, there are about 40 PRC visiting scholars and students studying on this excellent campus, and I am sure that the number will grow year by year. When they go back to China for nationbuilding, their thoughts will always be with you—marvelous people in the center of the United States. In five, ten or fifteen years time, they will come back to you for a happy reunion. Together, you will cheer for the Big Red. (Sure, the cheers will be even louder, because by then you will be reinforced by your children's voice—a new generation of Big Red fans.) Together, you will not only reminisce about your colorful college life, but also reflect on the path traversed: Have I developed to the maximum potential of my ability? Have I used my knowledge not just for my own good but for the welfare of the general public as well? Have I contributed to Sino-American friendship and, above all, to the creation of a better world? In a sense, that will be a different yet equally important commencement.

From this commencement to that one, from the pursuit of happiness to its realization, from the acquisition of tools and resources to their fine products, it is indeed a long journey. As we say in China: A thousand mile journey begins with the first step.

My dear friends, today you have taken the first step. It is a big, determined and decisive step. I wish you good luck all the way.

Thank you.●

UPPER WHITE OAK BAYOU FLOOD CONTROL ACT OF 1985

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, along with several of my Houston colleagues, legislation to authorize the construction of the Upper White Oak Bayou flood control project.

It's been 11 long years since the Congress last enacted a major water resources development bill and nearly 50 years since the last major revision of our Fedeal water policy laws.

During that time, we have witnessed the serious decline of our port system and the tragic suffering by individuals in hundreds of communities throughout this Nation who have been subjected to the ravages of persistent flooding. Several of these communities are located in my own congressional district.

Mr. Speaker, the people who live in central and northwest Houston, along the Upper White Oak Bayou, have made every effort to protect their homes and businesses from flooding. The Federal Government must now do its part to assist these courageous Americans who regrettably are unable to provide this badly needed flood protection.

The project authorized by this legislation has been carefully studied by both the Army Corps of Engineers and the House Public Works and Transportation Committee.

The Upper White Oak Bayou flood control plan has been enthusiastically supported by all interested parties and has been given high nationwide priority by the Army Corps of Engineers. Upon completion, this project will provide $1.50 worth of flood protection for every $1 of Federal cost.

While this Congress will undoubtedly spend a great deal of time discussing and hopefully implementing deficit reduction measures, I, nevertheless, strongly believe this project must be approved and that this Congress enact an omnibus authorization bill.

As my colleagues well know, in the last Congress, the leadership of the House Public Works and Transportation Committee labored long and hard to develop a comprehensive and cost effective water policy for this Nation.

As a result of their tireless efforts, the House of Representatives considered for the first time in a number of years an omnibus water resources development authorization bill.

Despite the fact that this vital legislation, H.R. 3678, was overwhelmingly approved on three separate occasions by the House in 1984, regrettably, the other body failed to debate this important proposal prior to its adjournment.

Nevertheless, I would like to express my deep appreciation to Chairman JIM HOWARD, Subcommittee Chairman BOB ROE, Congressman GENE SNYDER, and Congressman ARLAN STANGELAND for their personal interest and willingness to include the Upper White Oak Bayou project within H.R. 3678.

In addition, I understand this important project has been incorporated within H.R. 6, the Water Resources Conservation, Development and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1985 introduced by Chairman HOWARD on the first day of the new 99th Congress.

It is my fervent hope that we will quickly pass this vital legislation and that each Member of the House will, as I intend to do, prevail upon Members of the other body to expeditiously move this measure.

While I cannot speak for the dozens of other projects contained within Chairman HOWARD's bill, I strongly believe that the Federal investment called for in the Upper White Oak Bayou project is clearly justified. In evaluating this or any project, we must weigh the benefits which are derived to our Nation from vital communities with thriving industry, versus regional decay caused by persistent flooding which generates unemployment, saps our tax base, and impedes economic growth.

In fact, the Federal Government will end up saving millions of dollars by providing this flood protection rather than continue the endless cycle of rebuilding communities with Federal flood insurance money. In this way, we will not only provide these individuals with long-overdue flood relief but will simultaneously preserve our precious financial resources.

At the same time, it is important to recognize that my legislation has the added benefit of creating new jobs. According to the Army Corps of Engineers, the Upper White Oak Bayou flood control project will provide jobs both directly and indirectly to more than 2,000 Houstonians.

Mr. Speaker, the Upper White Oak Bayou project is sound. It is an investment in our Nation's future. It will save taxpayers money. It will create jobs. And, it will provide flood relief to thousands of citizens who must now suffer from the personal and economic hardships of persistent flooding.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to do whatever I can this year to seek the expeditious passage by both Houses of Congress of this long-overdue legislation. I urge my colleagues to join me in this most noble endeavor.

Finally, I would like to thank Congressmen ARCHER, LELAND, ANDREWS, and DELAY for joining me as sponsors of this legislation.●

REGULATING BIOTECHNOLOGY

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 16, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

REGULATING BIOTECHNOLOGY

Regulation of the emerging biotechnology industry is an important challenge facing the 99th Congress. Genetic engineering and other related forms of biotechnology are viewed by some as the most promising frontier since computers, offering us everything from double-size livestock to a cure for cancer. Others, frightened by the possibility that man-made organisms may wreak havoc on the environment, see biotechnology as a major menace. Yet there is general agreement among ecologists and biotechnicians alike that federal regulation of the fledgling industry is necessary. How tightly controls should be drawn is the question.

Even the most ardent critics of genetic engineering grant that its potential is enormous. It could revolutionize many different areas of human endeavor, including pharmaceutical and chemical manufacture, hazardous waste control, and energy production. Its greatest impact may be in animal and plant agriculture. For example, growth hormones to increase meat production and new crops that resist disease or make their own fertilizer are being developed. While the market for biotechnological products is less than $100 million today, it could be worth tens of billions in the next decade.

Congress faces many issues in biotechnology, including adequate federal funding of basic research, subsidized development abroad, revisions in patent law, extensions of tax breaks for "high-tech" research and development, and the misuse of biotechnology by other countries for military purposes. Its primary preoccupation, however, is the need for regulation. In recent months, critics called for strict oversight in general and a ban on some applications of biotechnology. A federal district judge halted federally-funded biotechnological experiments in the field.

Critics express several fundamental concerns. Ecologists cannot predict with any confidence what genetically-engineered organisms will do once outside the laboratory. Could a man-made organism designed to consume oil spills run amok and begin eating its way through fuel tanks or oil lubricating machinery? They point to gypsy moths, Dutch elm disease, and killer bees as examples of those rare but devasting intances when natural organisms introduced into a new environment ran out of control. They fear that in the rush to achieve the benefits of genetic engineering, the potential side effects have been given far too little scientific scrutiny.

On the other side, proponents of genetic engineering find these worries quite exaggerated, as fanciful as some "Killer-Tomato-Devours-Cleveland" movie. They suggest that similar objections could have been raised against the discovery of fire because fire always has had the potential to escape human control. They point out that the new biotechnologies are much more precise than the traditional ways in which scientists have caused genetic alterations, such as bombardment of cells with untraviolet rays. They also stress that genetic changes in organisms occur naturally all the time, and, moreover, that any genetic modification introduced in the laboratory is much more likely to impair rather than improve an organism's capability to adapt, making it less likely to survive on its own. In addition, they note that there are many ways to contain the spread of almost any organism.

Despite such assurances, rigorous oversight is necessary. The benefits of biotechnology are likely to be huge, but we cannot overlook the risks even while most ecologists admit that the possibility of a calamity is remote. From the industry's viewpoint, federal regulation may be regarded positively. It may forestall enactment of a patchwork of conflicting state regulations. If it helps head off a highly publicized crippling incident, it certainly will be in the industry's best interest. Most important, rigorous oversight is a comfort to the American people. Many concerns have been expressed, some legitimate, some not, so a prudent federal regulatory role is bound to create the feeling that responsible work is being done in a responsible way.

Currently, the main federal control over biotechnology is a review panel set up under the National Institutes of Health to judge the safety of government-backed experiments. It has no power over the private sector, but industry usually submits its experiments for approval anyway. As the products of biotechnology get closer to the marketplace, several federal agencies are taking responsibility for ensuring that they are safe. A presidential task force on biotechnology recently concluded that regulation can be handled properly under existing law by existing agencies, primarily the Environmental Protection Agency but also the Department of Agriculture and the Food and Drug Administration. It clarified the division of responsibility among the various agencies and called for the creation of a board to ensure that the evaluation of new products is consistent from agency to agency. Congress may go beyond the task force's effort and consider some regulatory improvements when the Toxic Substances Control Act comes up for renewal this year. A comprehensive biotechnology regulation bill is expected to be introduced in Congress soon.

The regulation of biotechnology must be rigorous, but it must be carried out in an equitable, balanced, and scientific manner. We need to weigh the public interest in regulation against the industry's need to innovate and stay competitive. An unreasonable and stifling regulatory system will not halt the progress of biotechnology: it will move the industry abroad. Other countries—notably Australia, France, Japan, England and West Germany—actively support biotechnology by designating it a national goal and accommodating its growth with a favorable system of regulation and economic and legislative assistance. If our regulations are too strict and our support is too casual, this future multibillion dollar industry could shift overseas.

The regulatory debate is taking place at the outset of biotechnology's development. Increased public attention to the issue means that we can hope to conduct a thorough examination of options and find a balanced solution to the problem.●

CONTINGENCY ELECTION PLAN

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, political pundits and constitutional scholars alike have endlessly dissected the problems associated with a Presidential election being thrown to the House. However, a glaring loophole still exists that could send our system into a tailspin.

Current law makes no provision for replacement of a candidate—Presidential or Vice Presidential—who dies or is disqualified during the 3-week period between inconclusive voting of the electoral college and balloting by the House and Senate. Although the Constitution calls on Congress to provide by law for this contingency, to date we have done nothing. A major political party could be left without a candidate. Moreover, the will of the people could be denied solely because we neglected our duty.

Section 4 of the 20th amendment calls on Congress to provide for the possibility that a candidate for President or Vice President could die or be disqualified between the inconclusive voting of the electoral college and the balloting by the House and the Senate—a period of some 3 weeks. I urge my colleagues to consider the consequences of postponing our constitutional challenge and needlessly risking the disenfranchisement of millions of Americans.

To address this gap in our election laws, I am proposing that should a candidate for President die or be disqualified between the time the electoral college deadlocks and the balloting by the House, the Vice Presidential running mate of that candidate shall be automatically elevated to consideration by the House for President. The newly elevated candidate shall then appoint a person to be considered by the Senate for Vice President. Additionally, my bill provides that should the Vice Presidential candidate die or be disqualified, the Presidential candidate shall name a replacement for consideration for Vice President by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, the 1984 Presidential election has concluded, and the time to act is now. To do nothing until or unless the contingency arises could make the Presidency itself a tarnished prize.●

EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP

HON. DOUGLAS H. BOSCO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Speaker, in early 1981, I became involved in an effort to try to perpetuate, as an independent company, the largest airline in California. For over 6 months, I worked closely with Continental Airlines employees and their employee association to try to get legislation enacted that would eliminate a lot of redtape in the granting of permits by the corporation commissioner in California, and had we been successful, there would still be an independent Continental Airlines. One of the leading proponents of employee ownership, Dickson C. Buxton, chairman of Private Capital Corp., introduced me to all of the complex provisions of the employee stock ownership plan [ESOP], and I became convinced that an ESOP could be used to help perpetuate many types of companies in America, especially the small- and medium-sized private corporation.

Mr. Buxton also described his efforts to try to affect changes in certain provisions of the Federal estate tax law so that the government would not unknowingly continue to force the sale of private businesses—due to the heavy estate taxes that are levied on closely held corporation stock; there is very little market for that stock.

I recently cosponsored legislation which provided for a solution to this problem. It passed as part of the 1984 tax bill, and now the closely held company itself can assume responsibility for payment of the tax through tax-deductible contributions to an employee stock ownership plan so that the stock, which would otherwise normally be acquired by some larger entity if the company were not liquidated, will be acquired by a trust for the employees who can help to continue the growth of that private business. This is now section 2210 [IRC] and it was one of four critical improvements in ESOP legislation. The other three involved a lower interest rate for ESOP loans to encourage this type of transaction, rather than a traditional leveraged buyout where ownership is concentrated; tax deductible dividends, if passed through to employees, to stimulate their interest in building the company; tax free rollover on sale of stock to an ESOP, under certain circumstances, to place the shareholder in the same position as if he had exchanged his shares with a larger company.

Mr. Buxton recently wrote an article for the ESOP Association which ties together all four of these significant improvements in ESOP regulation. In my opinion, the partial ESOP leveraged buyout is a much better solution for may owners of closely held corporation stock than the total sale of the company, usually to a larger enterprise, with the resultant loss of independence for the company and possibly jobs.

I wanted to share with my colleagues Mr. Buxton's insightful article which follows:

PARTIAL ESOP LEVERAGED BUYOUT

(By Dickson C. Buxton)

The ESOP provisions of the 1984 Tax Act (1) are specifically designed to encourage control stockholders of private corporations to consider the "ESOP alternative" to a total sale of their company. This ESOP alternative to the total leveraged buyout is far more attractive for all concerned than highly publicized total leveraged buyout transaction which results in: Concentrated ownership of corporate assets; staggering interest charges that usually result in the necessity to sell off assets; a reduction in the work force which ends the careers of many senior employees who helped build the business.

Many bankers are re-assessing their lending policy for this type of transaction. The Treasury is denied corporate income tax from many companies acquired in an LBO transaction, as the buyer usually arranges the sale to provide for a stepped-up basis in the assets (which are then depreciated all over again). This, together with the interest paid on acquisition debt, takes many LBO companies off state and federal tax rolls for many years.

The traditional LBO transaction is being carefully scrutinized by several members of Congress, as the transaction does not help our budget deficit problem at all; it exacerbates it! In addition, many LBO sales eventually cause higher unemployment through consolidation of management functions and executive terminations. In some cases, as assets are sold to meet debt reduction requirements, mass layoff of rank and file employees results.

When a plant is liquidated, the affected employees in the local community suffer, welfare costs increase and there are additions to our already bloated federal budget deficit.

The four significant ESOP provisions included in the Tax Reform Act of 1984 make a partial ESOP leveraged buyout (PELBO) a most attractive alternative to the outright sale of the company for those who have it within their power to make this choice.

The Interest Exemption provision (2) will result in an ESOP loan at approximately two-thirds of the interest rate which would otherwise be paid by the corporation—if the lender is in a marginal 46% tax bracket and is willing to pass the tax savings on to the ESOP Trustee. This, in addition to the deduction of principal payments on the loan through the ESOP contribution, allows far more leverage in the transaction and increases the price that can be paid for company shares when compared to the usual leveraged buyout transaction.

The Tax-Free Rollover provisions (3) allow deferral of capital gains tax for shareholders who re-invest in qualifying domestic corporation stock. A sale of 80% of their shares, on a tax-free basis, is in most cases the same as selling 100% of their shares in a taxable cash transaction. Plus, the shareholders will still own 20% of their original shares and can hold them for future growth.

Growth in shares which are retained by the present shareholders should accelerate, after the ESOP transaction, through Tax-Deductible Dividends on ESOP-owned stock. (4) Participants will then have quarterly reminders that their increased effectiveness translates into immediate income and growth in their ESOP accounts. This benefits all shareholders as their own shares grow at the same increased rate.

One of the new ESOP tax provisions, which we have been promoting for some time, creates the equivalent of an Estate Tax Credit for company shares transferred to the ESOP by an estate executor.(5) The ESOP trustee may pay for the shares over a 14 year period with a low interest loan from the government. The company deducts the payments of principal and interest on the loan.

Due to these new tax provisions, an ESOP, if part of a well-designed business perpetuation plan, can provide stockholders more for their shares in a PELBO than in most other transactions. For example, an ESOP bank loan for 80% of the fair market value of all shares will finance the purchase of these shares. If shareholders acquire qualified shares in other domestic corporations and develop a diversified portfolio, this will give them, after tax, as much value as they would have in an outright sale, and they would still retain 20% of their company shares, with estate liquidity provided for those shares. Employee shareholders would still have their jobs and their autonomy! Shares remaining (after the sale to the ESOP) can be sold to the ESOP upon death to help finance estate tax on non-company stock assets.

To summarize, the partial ESOP leveraged buyout (PELBO) will do the following:

Properly reward stockholders for the risks they have taken over the years.

Recognize the "sweat equity" of employees, many of whom have dedicated their lives to building the company. (Most employee stockholders, who are also in top management of private companies, feel this career risk should be rewarded.) The sale of the company to outsiders would jeopardize the careers and standard of living of many long-time dedicated employees. This causes many "control shareholders" to avoid a total sale of the company.

ESOP participation encourages employees to work harder and smarter to help their company earn the money necessary to pay off the ESOP bank loan.

A well-designed PELBO transaction should provide stock incentives for key employees to ensure continuity of management. In many cases, senior management acquire substantial blocks of stock at the outset of the transaction, paying for their shares through incentive bonus programs based upon achieving quarterly bottomline results for their divisions.

Numerous surveys provide conclusive evidence that companies which share ownership enjoy higher levels of employee productivity. (We were involved in one of the major surveys(6).) Therefore, lenders and shareholders can expect accelerated earnings after the PELBO. The government can expect tax collections will be higher.

All in all, this is a win-win-win type of transaction:

The sellers of shares get as much, in cash, after tax, if company pre-tax cash flow can support an 80% of fair market value loan to the ESOP.

The buyers (management and employee ESOP participants) are assured of continued tenure and job security if they continue to maintain profits. They will also build a capital estate for themselves.

The State and Federal governments can look forward to a continuation of at least part of the revenue collected prior to the sale of the company, with a rapid return to full participation and sharing of the tax burden as soon as acquisition debt is paid off.

The ESOP provisions of the 1984 Tax Act provide substantial inducements to "control shareholders" to investigate this PELBO alternative carefully before selling out to others in the traditional LBO transaction. All of us who are active in ESOP consulting are appreciative of the efforts of the cosponsors of the ESOP provisions of the new tax bill: Senator Russell Long, Congressmen Douglas Bosco and Charles Rangel.

1. a. Act Section 541, adding Section 1042 IRC, tax-free sale of Employer Securities to an ESOP;

b. Act Section 542, adding Section 409(k) IRC, amending Section 116 and 3406 IRC, corporate deduction for dividends payable to ESOP participants;

c. Act Section 543, adding Section 133 IRC, partial interest exclusion for certain lenders to an ESOP;

d. Act Section 544, adding Section 2210 IRC, assumption of estate tax liability by ESOP;

2. Partial interest exclusion for lenders to ESOPs—Act Section 543, adding Section 133 IRS.

Effective for loans extended after July 18, 1984, 50% of the interest received or accrued on loans to an ESOP or an employer having an ESOP to acquire stock for the ESOP is excluded from the income of the lender.

The section applies only to banks, insurance companies and corporations actively engaged in making such loans. It is specifically inapplicable to loans between corporate members of the same controlled group or to loans between the ESOP and the employer of any employees covered by the Plan or any member of a controlled group which includes such an employer.

3. Tax-free sales of employer securities—Act Section 541, adding Section 1042 IRC.

(a) a taxpayer who elects the application of Section 1042 to sale of Section 409(e) employer securities to an ESOP (but not ordinarily a TRASOP) may avoid recognition of gain upon the sale if—

I. after the sale, the ESOP owns at least 30% of the total value of employer securities, and

II. within 15 months beginning 3 months prior to the sale, the sellor purchases qualified replacement property (corporate stock, rights to subscribe for or receive corporate stock, bonds, debentures, notes, certificates or other evidences of indebtedness in registered form or with coupons attached issued by a domestic corporation that has no more than 25% passive income for the taxable year of issuance.

(b) No portion of the shares sold under Section 1042 may be allocated by the ESOP to the seller, members of his family (under Section 267(b)(4)) or any person who holds—directly or by Section 318(a) attribution—more than 25% in value of any class of outstanding Section 409(e) employer securities.

(c) The ESOP must retain shares acquired under Section 1042 for three years, except for the statutory permissible distributions at death, disability, retirement or severance. Any disposition by the ESOP will be deemed first to be of Section 1042 shares and unless sanctioned may attract a 10% excise tax upon the Plan.

(d) Stock sold under Section 1042 may not have been acquired under an option or other right granted by the employer; not by distribution from a qualified plan and must be issued by a domestic corporation having no issue readily traded on an established securities market.

(e) Any excess of deferred gain over the cost of replacement securities is taxable currently.

4. Corporate deduction for dividends paid to ESOPs—Act Section 542, adding Section 409(k), IRC and amending Sections 116 and 3406.

A special corporate deduction, allowed for tax years beginning after July 18, 1984, is now available for dividends paid in cash to an ESOP or TRASOP and either flowed through to participants directly or through the Plan within 90 days of the close of the Plan year.

5. Assumption of estate tax liability by ESOP—Act 3544 adding Section 2210 IRC.

(a) An Executor may elect to transfer (i.e., sell) a qualifying amount of 409(e) employee securities to an ESOP in consideration of the assumption by the ESOP of the federal estate tax attributable to such securities. The election must be accompanied by a written agreement under which the Plan administrator agrees to assume the appropriate amount of estate tax and another written agreement of the (or an) employer of employees covered by the Plan guaranteeing payment of the appropriate estate tax and any statutory interest by the Plan.

(b) The qualifying amount of employer securities is securities having a value equal to the estate tax assumed. The assumed tax is limited to the lesser of the value of the securities transferred or the estate tax imposed (less statutory credits allowed) upon the taxable estate.

Statutory credits allowed are: (1) the Unified Credit and (2) credits for state death taxes, gift tax paid, foreign death tax, tax on prior transfers and taxes on remainders or reversionary interests.

Note.—The Section 2210 transfer is a sale by the estate of securities included in gross estate for a consideration paid by assumption of estate tax liability. Transfers of excess value are not subject to Section 2210, so the Executor is not relieved of liability as to them. The Section 2210 transfer is treated as a Section 4975(e) loan, so is not subject to Prohibited Transactions tax; but it is a sale and does not generate a credit against tax.

If the Executor elects tax deferral under Section 6166 (for which the estate must meet all pre-conditions, including percentage of ownership based upon the total stock-holding inclusive of the shares sold under the shelter of Section 2210), the Plan administrator also may (but need not) elect to use Section 6166.

6. Summary of results of ESOP study done for Senate Finance Committee:

In 1979 Dickson C. Buxton, Chairman of Private Capital Corporation, conducted a survey at the request of Senator Russell B. Long, Chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, to determine the effect of ESOPs on the profitability and productivity of companies that have installed them, as well as to determine whether widespread use of ESOPs would increase, rather than decrease, federal government revenues from the corporate income tax. Based upon the return of detailed data from 72 respondents, the typical (average) company (in business 27 years and having installed an ESOP more than three years prior) showed, among other matters, the following results:

	Before ESOP	After ESOP	Increase (percent)
3-yr average:
Sales	$19,596,000	$33,780,000	+72
Pre-tax profits	$794,000	$2,039,000	+157
Taxes	$312,000	$780,000	+150
Employees	438	602	+37
Productivity:
Sales per employee	$44,700	$56,000	+25
Profit per employee	$1,812	$3,387	+86

While this survey and the summarized information above are not conclusive or necessarily predictive of future experience, Private Capital believes that it supports the view that significant productivity improvement has been associated with employee ownership. The study, entitled "Survey by the Senate Finance Committee", was published in The Congressional Record in October 1979 and summarized in a letter from the members of the Senate Finance Committee to the Editors of The New York Times published on October 24, 1979. Reference is made to the complete study for information concerning the methodology and assumptions used, the data obtained, and other observations and conclusions reached.●

HISTORY IN THE HOUSE

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, history was made when President Reagan was officially inaugurated in the rotunda of the Capitol. Likewise, a precedent was set 4 years ago when an inaugural ceremony was held for the first time on the west front of the Capitol rather than at the more traditional east front site.

In the past three ceremonies marking the assumption of authority by the Chief Magistrate of our Nation have taken place in several diverse settings, including Statuary Hall, formerly the Hall of the House of Representatives.

In the second issue of "History in the House," the Office of the Bicentennial describes the occasions when Presidents were administered the oath of office in the House Chamber. It makes for very interesting and timely reading.

The article follows:

[From the History in the House, January 1985]

PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATIONS IN THE HOUSE CHAMBER

JOHN ADAMS

"Your dearest friend never had a more trying day than yesterday," wrote President John Adams to his wife Abigail after his inauguration as the second President of the United States in 1797. This was the first of seven inaugurations to be held in the Chamber of the House of Representatives. The Congress was meeting in Philadelphia at the time and was still three years away from its move to Washington, D.C. The inauguration of John Adams also marked the first time in American history that there was a transfer of executive power. The press marveled at the virtues of a Republic where a Chief Magistrate actually attended the inauguration of his successor. Adams himself was overshadowed in the outpouring of emotion accompanying the retirement of George Washington.

George Washington preceded Adams into the crowded Chamber to much applause. Adams sat in the elevated seat of the Speaker of the House. On his right sat the new Vice-President Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and the Secretary of the Senate. The Speaker of the House, Jonathan Dayton, and the Clerk of the House, John Beckley, were to his left and four Justices of the Supreme Court were seated at a table in front of Adams. After his address, Adams descended from his chair and Chief Justice Oliver Ellsworth administered the oath of office. This was the first time that the Chief Justice administered the oath to a President-elect. At George Washington's first inaugural the oath was administered by Robert Livingstone, Chancellor of the State of New York, and at the second by William Cushing, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

When the ceremony was over Adams sat down briefly, then rose and bowed and left the Chamber. At this point there was a question of precedence regarding who should leave next, Washington insisting that Jefferson go ahead of him. Adams held a modest reception after the inauguration, but the main event of the day was an elaborate farewell banquet given to George Washington by the merchants of Philadelphia.

No member of Adams's family attended the inauguration, but the new President wrote his wife the next day: "A solemn scene it was, indeed, and it was made more affecting to me by the presence of the General, whose countenance was as serene and unclouded as the day. . . . In the Chamber of the House of Representatives was a multitude as great as the space would contain, and I believe scarcely a dry eye but Washington's."

James Madison

Both of James Madison's inaugurations, 1809 and 1813, took place in the House Chamber. This was particularly appropriate since Madison was the first President to have been a Member of the House, having served in the first four Congresses.

The Capitol Building in Washington was still unfinished in 1809, but the imposing Hall of Representatives, considered to be the most beautiful room in America, had been in use since 1807. This room, on the site of present-day Statuary Hall, was destroyed in 1814 when the British burned the Capitol Building.

On March 4, 1809, the Hall of the Representatives was filled to capacity and 10,000 persons had gathered outside the building in the bright sunshine. John Quincy Adams, former U.S. Senator and later to be President himself, wrote in his diary: "The House was very much crowded and its appearance very magnificent."

Outgoing President Thomas Jefferson refused to share the limelight and declined an invitation to ride in the inaugural carriage with Madison and his wife Dolley. Jefferson, accompanied by his grandson, rode to the Capitol on horseback, hitched the horse to a nearby picket fence, and once inside took an inconspicuous seat below the dais, much to the chagrin of the Committee on Arrangements.

Madison had a slight vocal disability that made his inaugural address almost inaudible to those in the House Chamber. When he finished speaking, Chief Justice John Marshall administered the oath of office. Madison then reviewed the volunteer militia assembled on the Capitol grounds and returned to his home by carriage, where refreshments were served and the guests were treated to some of Dolley Madison's famous hospitality.

At Long's Hotel that night about 400 people attended the first inaugural ball to be held in Washington.

Vice-President George Clinton, who was continuing in office, did not attend the inauguration and took the oath of office on May 22, when Congress convened.

Madison's second inaugural on March 4, 1813, was almost exactly like the 1809 ceremony. Madison even wore the same suit, which the press had praised for being one of American manufacture from the wool of domestically raised merino sheep. The Vice-President, Elbridge Gerry, took the oath in Boston rather than make a special trip to Washington for that purpose.

James Monroe

After the British burned the Capitol in 1814, the Congress held its sessions in the Old Brick Capitol, a block away on the site where the Supreme Court Building now stands. The Capital was still being rebuilt in 1817 when President-elect Monroe requested the use of this temporary House Chamber for his inauguration. But Speaker of the House Henry Clay, who was angry at Monroe for selecting John Quincy Adams instead of himself as Secretary of State, refused the request, and the ceremony was held outdoors in front of the Old Brick Capitol. Monroe's second inauguration in 1821 was scheduled to be held outdoors but heavy snow and rain forced the ceremony indoors to the newly reconstructed House Chamber (now Statuary Hall) in the Capital Building. This room was the scene of all subsequent House Chamber inaugurations. There have been no inaugurations in the present Chamber, which has been in use since 1857.

In 1821, for the first time in our nation's history, Inauguration Day, March 4, fell on a Sunday. President Monroe consulted Secretary of State John Quincy Adams, who turned to Chief Justice Marshall to decide if it was proper to begin his second term on a legal holiday. The Chief Justice determined that although the President's term expired on March 3 at midnight, he favored postponing the ceremony until Monday, March 5. The Vice-President, Daniel S. Tompkins, who was ill at home in New York City, took the oath privately on March 3 and then took the oath again on March 5.

The crowds for Monroe's second inaugural were so great that several diplomats in full dress uniforms could not get into the Chamber through the crush of people in the corridors. More than 2,000 persons were in the Chamber itself. John Quincy Adams wrote in his diary:

"The President, attired in full suit of black broadcloth of somewhat antiquated fashion, with shoe-and knee buckles, rode in a plain carriage with four horses and a single colored footman. . . . There was no escort, nor any concourses of people on the way. But on alighting at the Capitol a great crowd of people were assembled and the avenues to the hall of the house were so choked up with persons pressing for admittance that it was with the utmost difficulty that the President made his way through them into the House."

Adams recorded that the crowd was boisterous and that "loud talking and agitation in the gallery" did not stop even when the President was reading his inaugural address. For the first time at an inauguration music accompanied the ceremony as the Marine Band played during Monroe's entrance and departure.

John Quincy Adams

In 1825 John Quincy Adams, whose diaries record details of the inaugurations of Presidents before him, became President himself. The new President's father, ninety year-old former President John Adams, was not among the members of the Adams family to attend the inauguration. He remained home in Massachusetts, although some secondary accounts of the inauguration claim that he was at the ceremony. Outgoing President James Monroe established the tradition of escorting his successor to the Capitol. Unlike the boisterous crowds in 1821, the people in the galleries during John Quincy Adams's inauguration were "remarkable for their stillness and decorum" according to one local newspaper.

Perhaps no President has been more intimately connected with the House than John Quincy Adams. This ceremony in the House Chamber had a unique and poignant aspect, since it was the House of Representatives that elected Adams President. When there is no majority in the Electoral College, the Constitution provides that the election be decided by the House of Representatives. This has happened only twice, in 1800 (when Jefferson was elected) and in 1824.

After his four year presidential term, Adams served seventeen years in the House and suffered a fatal stroke in the same Chamber in which he was inaugurated. His funeral, held in this Hall that meant so much to him, was a grand yet quietly dignified tribute to one of America's greatest public servants.

Andrew Jackson

The 1829 inauguration of Andrew Jackson was the first of many to be held outdoors on the East Portico of the Capitol. In 1833 Jackson planned to use the East Portico again, but snow, freezing temperatures and high wind drove the ceremony inside to the House Chamber.

Jackson's second inaugural was a simple one. Although there was no formal procession or military escort, many citizens braved the high winds and cold to wait at the Capitol doors. For the first time the President was received at the Capitol by the mayor of Washington and members of the city council.

Jackson, who was in poor health, returned to the White House and went to bed right after the swearing-in ceremony and did not attend any receptions or balls. The Vice-President, Martin Van Buren, also took his oath of office in the House Chamber.

Millard Fillmore

The last time the House Chamber was used for a Presidential inauguration was in 1850 after the sudden death of President Zachary Taylor. Taylor had attended a hot Fourth of July ceremony connected with the building of the Washington Monument and overindulged in cherries and iced milk. That night he was attacked by cholera morbus and fever and died five days later. This was the first time a President had died while the Congress was is session. The House and Senate convened at 11 o'clock on July 10, 1850, to receive the message from Vice-President Millard Fillmore that the President had died the night before. Fillmore proposed to take his oath as President at noon that same day.

This swearing-in ceremony had none of the pomp of a regular inauguration and was conducted quickly and solemnly, befitting a nation mourning the loss of a President. The gallery was crowded when the House convened at noon. Four minutes later the Senate entered the House Chamber, accompanied by the Senate's Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary. The Speaker of the House presided and all rose when Millard Fillmore and his cabinet entered the Chamber, escorted by a joint committee of Representatives and Senators. The oath was administered by Judge William Cranch, Chief Justice of the District and Circuit Court of the United States. The new President left the Chamber immediately without any remarks or speeches, but he quickly sent the Congress a message mourning the death of his predecessor. The National Intelligencer, a Washington newspaper, observed, "The profound silence of so great an assemblage of deeply concerned spectators, the ceremony, so brief and so simple, yet so important in its consequences, national, political, and personal, presented an incident and a scene altogether American."

What the Intelligencer saw as American was the theme that has been present in all of this nation's inaugurals—the open and orderly transfer of authority from one person to another, from one party to another, through almost 200 years of government under the Constitution of the United States.

TOWARD A CURE FOR NEUROFIBROMATOSIS

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, today, 34 other Members of the House and I join as original cosponsors in the introduction of a bill to establish a National Commission on Neurofibromatosis. We are pleased that a similar bill is being introduced simultaneously in the Senate by Majority Leader ROBERT DOLE.

Neurofibromatosis often referred to as NF, is a genetic disorder of the central nervous system occurring in 1 out of every 3,000 births. Approximately 100,000 people in the United States today have this disease; it occurs in both sexes and in all ethnic and racial groups. Each child of an affected parent has a 50-percent chance of inheriting the gene and developing NF.

Neurofibromatosis is totally unpredictable. Manifestations usually appear in childhood or adolescence, though they can appear later in life. Children with NF can frequently be identified shortly after birth by the appearance of a number of light brown spots. NF patients may develop a number of problems including many small tumors under or on the skin, large tumors just under the skin, curvature of the spine, enlargement and deformation of bones, and tumors of the auditory and optic nerves. These problems can lead to other problems like deafness and blindness which then create severe educational, economic, and social problems.

The cause of NF is unknown. There is no cure and medical opinions on treatment vary.

I hope this bill can help bring a nationwide focus to what we are now doing, and identify what more we need to do, to find a cure for NF. The National Commission would have 2 years to assess the nature and extent of public and private research into neurofibromatosis and to develop a plan to identify the research needed to develop a cure. The Commission would be composed of 12 members, including representatives of the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Disorders and Stroke, the Director of the National Cancer Institute, the National Institute of General Medical Sciences, the National Institute of Child Health and Development, and the Department of Education. These representatives would be joined by three scientists or health professionals, and three individuals who have experience with the disorder. This approach is modeled after the National Commission established by the Congress for Huntington's disease in 1977.

For Members who have not yet cosponsored this legislation, I would like to share a letter received by Congressman WIRTH from a mother whose baby has NF. This letter conveys a more eloquent plea for this legislation than anything we might say.

FLORISSANT, MO,
September 4, 1984.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WIRTH: My son is now nine months old. At birth, Matthew weighed nine pounds and thirteen ounces, and was as healthy and beautiful as we could have hoped. At four months, I began to notice several brown spots, appearing on his back and legs. At first, I simply thought he had inherited a birth mark, like the one I have on my leg. I have since learned that I have passed on to him, the genetic disorder, called Neurofibromatosis, or NF. My case is mild. My physician never noticed it, but this is not the case with Matthew. He is progressing as the "classic" NF case does. This is typical of NF. It's "hit and miss" pattern is common. Still, if my physician had been better acquainted with NF, he very likely could have alerted me before I had a baby. I love Matthew dearly, but I worry that if the NF progresses severely, he may wish that he had not been born.

When we were first told he had NF, I had no idea what it was. It has been a much neglected disease, even though it is the most common genetic disease. Someone told me it was the disease the "Elephant Man" had. I had never seen the movie, because I had heard it was so sad. Unwisely, I borrowed a book about the "Elephant Man" and saw a photo of him. You can't imagine the horror I felt for my baby. I was terrified to think of what was to become of his beautiful face and skin. He still, at nine months, is as beautiful as when he was born, but so was the "Elephant Man" until he was two years old.

My husband and I took him to the best doctors in St. Louis, and heard the same thing. There has been little research of NF, no cure, no real treatment, no prenatal test for an unborn baby. There is a 50/50 chance that I would pass it on to any future children.

This all made me angry at first. Why haven't doctors done something about this? How can they simply look at my baby and me and tell us there is nothing they can do? Why haven't they alerted the public to this terrible disease, that effects one in every 3000 people, and little is being done about it? Some 100,000 people in the United States have NF.

Now, all we can do is wait until he reaches puberty, and pray that someone will help us find a cure for NF, before the hormonal change causes it to advance rapidly. It could disfigure him so badly, that he could never lead a normal life. It could cause him to develop a tumor in a vital organ, such as the brain, and kill him. Representative Wirth, you have the power to help us. To save my child's life, or to give him a chance at life like other children. If you would please cosponsor the House Bill, H.R. 1676, which would establish a National Neurofibromatosis Commission.

The public, like I was not long ago, is almost completely ignorant of this disease, and a National Commission would help to educate the public, so that we would be able to obtain funds to find a cure, a drug that would kill the neurofibromas that wrap themselves around our nerve cells. But, the public is not alone in ignorance of this disease. Many physicians also do not know the first signs of NF. That is the experience we had. The time to find out you have a genetic disease is not when you have a baby severely affected, but before you have a child.

Before we learned of all this, I felt there was no happier person in the world, than I. I had a wonderful husband, and a beautiful, sweet baby. That's all I had ever wanted. Now, I live in fear each day, that I will look at his skin and see the NF tumors beginning to grown and ruin his life.

Please help us, Representative Wirth. You are a very influential person, being a member of the "Energy and Commerce Committee on Health and Environment". I am a proud person, but I beg you, plead with you, with all the love a mother feels for her child. Please co-sponsor this bill. Please give us and the other victims, some 700 in St. Louis alone, some ray of hope that some day there will be a cure, or a treatment for Neurofibromatosis.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

NANCY E. YOUNGERMANN.●

MARILYN SMITH

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, Marilyn Smith was the personification of courage. Her loss was a tragedy for her community and for her friends and loving family. She was a great role model for so many people. I knew her best through her son David who interned in our office a few years ago and was a pleasure to have working with us.

The editorial from the Miami Herald that follows captures part of her spirit and the specialness of Marilyn. I join with her many friends and loved ones in remembrance and sorrow.

[From The Miami Herald, Jan. 5, 1985]

MARILYN SMITH

Not all the good die young, but enough do to give that lament real meaning. Marilyn Smith—consummate volunteer—died last week at age 48. That's too soon for the Greater Miami community to have lost her dedication and special talents.

Mrs. Smith, vice president of the Greater Miami Jewish Federation and a board member of the United Way among other duties, was that rare individual with the knack of engaging others in a cause by the sheer force of her own sincerity. Her speeches on behalf of the federation, United Way, and the Miami Opera Guild, to name a few, were compelling in their eloquent simplicity and refreshing for the absence of high-pitched emotionalism. She relied on her well-defined sense of dedication to convey her message forcefully. It always worked. Colleagues marveled at her ability to draw the most out of others—a necessity for a leader in the volunteer field.

When people recall their first meeting with Mrs. Smith, they invariably say the same thing: "What struck me most about Marilyn when we met was the way she made me feel at home, and so welcome." She had the same gracious attitude about her work. Not long ago, Mrs. Smith wrote of her views on volunteering. The effort was not just a payment of "Jewish dues," she said. She regarded it as a "privilege, a chance to grow . . . and a perpetuation of the dreams and values of our people. . . ." That caring attitude and the results of living up to it have created a legacy that make Mrs. Smith's passing all the more poignant.●

840,000 SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENTS SHORTCHANGED A MONTHLY AVERAGE OF $32.50 IN FISCAL YEAR 1983

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I recently asked the Social Security Administration what their error rate was in underpayments to Social Security beneficiaries.

Not counting the errors which occur from the late posting of earnings records, the results are significant: In fiscal year 1983, errors resulted in the underpayment of $332 million to 840,000 recipients, a monthly average of $32.50 per recipient.

While the response shows that the error rates are relatively low, they can by very, very important to the seniors involved. And what is especially disturbing is that the level of errors seems to be rising rapidly.

The Reagan administration is talking about cutting the number of Social Security Administration employees, but until we get these error rates back down and until we get earnings records posted in a more timely manner, it is almost open robbery of the Nation's elderly to make staffing cuts in this agency.

Persons contributing to Social Security have the right to expect and to get an accurate benefit payment. Clearly, the data from Social Security shows that people must do more to protect themselves and to ensure that they get an accurate payback from SSA.

A person can check their earnings records by completing form 7004—available at local Social Security offices. The office will reply with a computer readout showing the last 3 years of earnings, plus a lump sum of total earnings since contributions began—excluding the last 3 years. By ensuring that one's earnings records are being accurately recorded, one can then check the calculation of benefits to ensure that the correct payment is being received. I believe it is important for citizens to do this. Social Security—like all the rest of us—is not infallible and an error can result in the loss of thousands of dollars of retirement income over the years.

Following is the letter from SSA detailing the underpayment sitution:

THE COMMISSIONER OF SOCIAL SECURITY,
Baltimore, MD, December 19, 1984.

Hon. FORTNEY H. STARK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. STARK: This is in further response to your inquiry concerning Title II Social Security retirement and survivors insurance underpayments. Please accept my apology for the delay in sending you a full response.

Other than underpayments due because of delayed posting to earnings records, most Title II retirement and survivors underpayments are the result of benefits being computed incorrectly or of incorrect wages or self-employment income being used. About 80 percent of these errors are administrative. In fiscal year (FY) 1983, these errors accounted for about 3.2 percent of our benefit accounts being underpaid an average of $32.50 month. The underpayment rate for FY 1982 was 2.9 percent with an average underpayment of $22.50 per month. For FY 1981, 2.2 percent of our beneficiary accounts were underpaid an average monthly amount of $23.80.

To put these error data into perspective, we can relate them to the total payment rolls for the years involved. For FY 1983, this projects to .84 million underpayment cases out of a total of 26.3 million cases in payment status. This resulted in total underpayments of $332 million in relation to total continuing payments of $144.5 billion, representing a dollar rate of less than one-quarter of 1 percent.

For FY 1982, this projects to .75 million of 25.9 million cases, for a total underpayment of $200 million,which is less than one-seventh of 1 percent of the total continuing payments of $133.6 billion. For FY 1981, the projections were .55 million of 25.2 million cases for total underpayments of $152 million, or less than one-eighth of 1 percent of the total continuing payments of $116.9 billion. We estimate that about 35 to 40 percent of these underpayments are discovered in our operational processes at a later point and repaid to the beneficiaries.

Underpayments are detected by various types of quality review, one of which is the retirement and survivors insurance payment accuracy review process. Each year, we select a small number of cases for intensive review to determine the accuracy of payments. Under this process, we examine all case data, interview the beneficiary, and verify the evidence used to establish eligibility for payment. In addition to our quality review processes, underpayments come to light when we process subsequent transactions on a case or a beneficiary may make us aware that additional payment is due. After we verify that an underpayment is due, the current benefit rates are adjusted and payment is made for all retroactive benefits.

At the beginning of 1984 we undertook a number of initiatives designed to identify the causes, and how we could prevent, both overpayments and underpayments. We found that the major cause, other than delayed posting of earnings, of underpayments is high estimates of earnings by beneficiaries. Therefore, we have taken steps to reduce underpayments from both sources, including:

"Getting more precise earnings estimates from beneficiaries (this will also help reduce overpayments);

"More timely processing of recomputations, where new earnings are used to increase benefits; and

"Preventing errors in processing earnings reports that, unless detected, can lead to large underpayments."

Although the percentage to underpayments, especially as measured in benefit amounts, is very small, we recognize that the effect on individual beneficiaries can be significant. For the reason, we are committed to continuing our efforts to reduce both underpayments and overpayments.

We hope this information is helpful to you.

Sincerely,

MARTHA A. MCSTEEN,
Acting Commissioner.●

TAXES AND THE DEFICIT

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, during last year's Presidential campaign Walter Mondale eagerly promised to raise taxes if elected.

On November 6, the American people soundly repudiated Mr. Mondale's tax increase—and did so by the largest electoral margin in our Nation's history.

The American people know that if taxes are raised in 1985, Congress will undoubtedly find a way to spend the additional money.

The American people would not be fooled by Mr. Mondale, and will not be fooled by Congress.

Let's take a good clear look at whether or not tax increases have helped to reduce the deficit in the last several years.

In August 1982, Congress passed the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act [TEFRA] raising $98.3 billion over 3 years. The increase was to be accompanied by spending cuts of $3 for each $1 of new revenue. However, most of those spending cuts never materialized. In fact, we ended up with about $1.67 in additional spending for every $1 of new taxes. In fiscal year 1982, we faced a deficit of $110.6 billion. Despite the 1982 tax increase, the deficit climbed to $195.4 billion for fiscal year 1983.

In 1984, Congress cleared the so-called Deficit Reduction Act increasing taxes by $50 billion over 3 years. Instead of the deficit falling, however, it will climb to $230 billion in fiscal year 1985 according to the Office of Management and Budget's recent estimates.

Tax increases haven't reduced the deficit because spending continues to climb—from $728.4 billion in fiscal year 1982, to $796 billion in fiscal year 1983, to an estimated $841.8 billion in fiscal year and $930.6 billion in fiscal year 1985. That is nearly a 30-percent increase since fiscal year 1982. By contrast, inflation amounted to only around 9 percent from 1982 through 1984.

The December 14 issue of National Review carried a pertinent article in which Antonio Martino, a professor on monetary theory and policy at the University of Rome, cited Italy's recent experience to drive home the warning against tax increases to cover the Federal deficit.

According to Professor Martino, Italy has a deficit of more than 11 percent of gross domestic product [GDP] in 1980. Italian officials then ordered a drastic tax increase. From 1980 to 1983, the total tax revenue increased 90 percent in nominal terms, jumping from 39.8 percent of the GDP to 47.8 percent.

In the same period, the Italian deficit increased from $19.68 billion in 1980 to $46.92 billion in 1983, a rise of 138 percent.

When allowance is made for inflation, the deficit, adjusted in real terms, increased from 11 to 16.5 of GDP, a jump of more than 51 percent. Professor Martino concluded that "when the politicians pass a tax increase, they spend it all and a good deal more." To prove his point he says, "public spending in Italy, has jumped from 48.8 percent of GDP in 1980 to a staggering 61.2 percent in 1983."

Antonio Martino, professor of monetary theory and policy at the University of Rome, has reviewed Italy's recent experience to warn against a tax increase to "cover the federal deficit." In 1980, Italy had a horrendous deficit, more than 11 per cent of gross domestic product (the equivalent of a deficit of more than $350 billion here). "The solution was a drastic increase in taxes: from 1980 to 1983 the total tax revenue increased 90 per cent in nominal terms, jumping from 39.8 per cent of the GDP to 47.8 per cent. This is a very large increase, and it was made all the more painful by the fact that there was no real GDP increase over the same period." Did that end the deficit? Of course not. "Contrary to the expectations of the deficit-cutters, the Italian deficit increased from $19.68 billion in 1980 to $46.92 billion in 1983—a 138 per cent rise. Even when inflation is taken into account, the deficit has increased in real terms by more than 51 per cent, going from 11 per cent to 16.5 per cent of GDP." The phenomenon is universal. Regardless of the deficit, when the politicians pass a tax increase they spend it all and a good deal more. Politicians love deficits, not only so they can spend more, but so they have an excuse to raise taxes. And they won't abandon these practices unless forced to. In Italy, "public spending has jumped from 48.8 per cent of GDP in 1980 to a staggering 61.2 per cent in 1983."

Tax increases did not reduce Italy's deficit. They did not reduce the U.S. deficit in 1982 or 1984.

Tax increases should be soundly rejected as the remedy for deficits in 1985. The real culprit is continued overspending on the part of Congress.●

ZUCKERT MANAGEMENT AWARD TO GEN. DEWEY K.K. LOWE

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and pleasure today to congratulate Maj. Gen. Dewey K.K. Lowe, commander, Sacramento Air Logistics Center, McClellan Air Force Base, CA, on another career accomplishment. General Lowe has been chosen as the 1984 recipient of the Air Force's Zuckert Management Award, an honor that is well deserved in light of his proven abilities in managing Air Force programs and people.

General Lowe has been commander at SM-ALC for over 5 years and in that time has led the Sacramento center to unprecedented excellence. The center was awarded the 1983 Maintenance Effectiveness Award in the depot and aircraft maintenance categories. SM-ALC was chosen as the system program manager for the advanced technical fighter aircraft and program manager and technology center for very high-speed integrated circuits, fiber optics, and advanced composites. These programs enable the AFLC to facilitate technology transfer, influence development, and exploit technology.

Several of General Lowe's management improvements, like the commander's information network system, have been adopted commandwide. The information network system provides senior ALC managers with on-line capability to access decision support information. For example, much of the budgetary data has been automated making it available within 6 to 10 days after the end of the month instead of the usual 15 to 17 days.

As chief of the Air Force management analysis group, General Lowe led the effort that devised new contracting and manufacturing procedures and led to the establishment of the Office of Competition Advocacy within the Logistics Command in 1983. Due to this initiative, both Air Force officials and industry are significantly reducing the overpricing of spares purchases Air Forcewide.

Further examples of General Lowe's management effectiveness are too numerous to cite here. Taken together, they represent an outstanding demonstration of leadership that is truly deserving of the Zuckert Management Award.●

WALPOLE, MA, SELECTS CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the things that makes an elected official very happy is when he finds himself in very solid agreement with the opinions of his constituents on an important matter. So I was delighted to learn that I am in complete agreement with the selection committee in the town of Walpole which selected Sister St. Vincent as Walpole's Citizen of the Year.

I have worked closely with Sister St. Vincent for the past several years, and she is one of those people who teaches every minute of her life, by example, what goodness, charity, and love really mean. Sister St. Vincent is justifiably one of the most beloved people in the town of Walpole for her great work among the elderly. Typically she is dividing the prize money she received between the Wrentham State School for the Retarded and a group that serves older people in the town of Walpole.

I am honored to be able to call Sister St. Vincent a friend and I congratulate the very farsighted people of Walpole who have conveyed this very well-deserved honor on her.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the article from the the Walpole Times about Sister St. Vincent's award be printed here.

[From the Walpole Times, Dec. 13, 1984]

SISTER ST. VINCENT IS CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

(By Dave Matthews)

Sister Mary St. Vincent Stynes, a teacher and friend to hundreds of residents for the past 13 years, has been selected Walpole's 1985 Citizen of the Year, the award's selection committee announced this week.

Sister St. Vincent, a dynamo of good humor and compassion was chosen unanimously by the committee for her charitable work among Walpole's elders, volunteer work at Southwood Community Hospital and years of faithful service to retarded youngsters at the Wrentham State School.

Informed early Tuesday of her selection, the usually voluble Sister St. Vincent said. "I can't believe it. There must be somebody else."

A nun for more than 50 years, she came to Walpole in 1971 and taught fifth grade at Blessed Sacrament Elementary School until she retired from teaching in 1976.

"I haven't exactly retired," she corrected amiably. "Semi-retired," she smiled.

For the past eight years she has been a fixture at Walpole's elder housing developments, Diamond Pond Terrace and Neponset View Terrace.

"She's a marvelous sister," said Diamond Pond resident, Mary McNamara, who receives a luncheon visit each Wedensday from Sister St. Vincent. "I like her because she's for the underdog . . . She can't do enough for people."

"She brings sunshine around," said Betty Densberger, director of the Walpole Housing Authority which administers the elder housing units. "I couldn't really begin to tell you all the good she's done."

Densberger termed Sister St. Vincent "our number one social worker."

A good portion of Sister St. Vincent's day is spent in service to Walpole elders, visiting the sick, the lonely and shut-ins. According to Sr. St. Vincent, loneliness among Walpole elders is a major problem.

"They're very lonely and need companionship," she said. "I go visit them, chat with them and have 10 cups of tea a day."

Her ability to drink tea is nearly as famous as the Nike tennis shoes she often wears as she make her rounds about town on foot. Of the former, says Densberger. "We've counted up to 26 cups of tea in one day," and of the latter and its bearing on Sister St. Vincent's nickname. The Flying Nun. "She's flying around here in her Nikes."

Some of her work among Walpole elders is spiritual; she distributes Communion at home to those unable to attend Mass, but much or her work is ecumenical.

"There's nobody she ever turns away," said Densberger.

Sister St. Vincent is legendary for her ability to organize social activities—parties, luncheons, virtually any kind of fellowship. Presently she is organizing at least two Christmas parties for elders, and in years past, she would organize Yuletide caroling groups of Blessed Sacrament youngsters and travel to local nursing homes to spread holiday cheer.

As recently as Thanksgiving she collected and distributed food baskets for those in need.

Her reputation as one who knows the needs of people in need has allowed Sister St. Vincent to act as a go-between. She interacts with many civil organizations to channel help to those in need. "She brings back to us needs we don't know exist," said Densberger.

Each Friday she travels to Southwood Community Hospital where she is a trained volunteer who specializes in visiting cancer patients. "When you come out of there, you're happy you can walk on two feet," she says.

In addition, Sister St. Vincent has carried her special brand of compassion to the sick at Norwood Hospital and the old Foxboro State Hospital.

In past years Sister St. Vincent's nearly boundless energy led her to participate in the Pace for Project FACE fundraising walkathon. She also served that organization as a volunteer worker.

Born in Ireland, Sister St. Vincent came to the U.S. in 1928 and immediately entered the convent of the Sisters of St. Francis of Glen Riddle, Pa. In 1978 she celebrated her 50th anniversary as a member of that order.

She has spent most of her religious life teaching first, fifth and sixth graders in Catholic schools in Rhode Island, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

In all she estimates she's taught about 500 children—200 in Walpole alone—all of whom she remembers with fondness. She says her teaching philosophy was based on two principles: "I always try to be fair with the children. I always try to have them trust those in authority."

As the recipient of the 1985 Willis D. McLean Citizen of the year Award, Sister St. Vincent is splitting the $500 prize which accompanies it between the Wrentham State School and a Walpole elder service organization. She hopes the latter share will be used to buy a video cassette recorder so elders can get together to watch rented movies—good movies. "I would make sure that they got the good ones," she said.

Her only secret is her age; she delights in extracting a promise not to reveal it from a nosy reporter devious enough to try and deduce it through a series of trick questions. One jump ahead, she was so charmingly evasive, the reporter couldn't remember his own age following the questioning.

Sister St. Vincent will be honored at the Walpole Chamber of Commerce Ball Feb. 9 at Bernardi's. The Citizen of the year Award is co-sponsored by the Chamber and The Walpole Times.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian people threw off the yoke of repression and declared their independence. The formation of the Ukrainian National Republic 67 years ago signified an important step in the history of the Ukrainian people as they have long struggled to assert their identity and their beliefs and preserve their meaningful culture while under foreign domination. I would like to take this opportunity to bring this important date to the attention of my colleagues.

Although 67 years have passed since this declaration, the memory of this day still lives on in the hearts of all Ukrainians. The Ukrainian nation rose out of the ashes of the Russian and Austro-Hungarian empires in 1918 and attempted to realize the dreams of their forefathers in declaring their independence. From the first, the new nation struggled to hold on to its newfound freedom, battered by Russian armies from the east and Polish armies from the west. Despite a valiant effort, the Ukrainian National Republic was crushed by the Communist Russians in the summer of 1920, only 3 years after its formation.

Since then, the Ukrainian people have suffered 65 years of repression and persecution at the hands of Soviet aggressors. They have been imprisoned and tortured for their political and religious beliefs and the doors of their churches and schools have been closed. Furthermore, during the 1930's, the Soviet Government attempted to erase an entire culture and race with the famine of 1932-33. During this manmade famine, 7 to 10 million Ukrainians starved to death because of Stalin's cruel collectivization program which resulted in widespread famine in the Ukraine. The causes and full effects of this famine are not yet known because the Soviet Government suppressed any information about the famine. Additionally, very little public awareness about this mass tragedy exists today.

For this reason, during the 98th Congress, I, together with Senator BILL BRADLEY from New Jersey, introduced legislation (H.R. 4459, S. 2456) to establish a 15-member congressional commission to study for 2 years the causes and effects of this great famine. As we recall the memory of January 18, 1918, during this 67th anniversary, I am proud to inform my colleagues that our legislation was attached by the other body to the continuing resolution which was signed by the President on October 12, 1984. The Commission on the Ukraine Famine is currently being formed and within 2 years, not only will a governmental study be available on this famine but we will also be able to promote public awareness of this tragedy.

Despite famines and persecution, despite the curtailment of their civil liberties, and despite the injustices that they have been subjected to, the Ukrainian people continue to display courage and perseverance and have not yet given up hope that, one day, they, too, will breathe the air of freedom. We must continue to remember this momentous declaration in the hope that our remembrance of this glorious moment will lend the Ukrainian people encouragement and hope. As the famous Ukrainian poet, Taras Schevchenko, said, "Our souls will never perish, freedom knows no dying." May the hope for freedom for the Ukrainian people never die and may their quest for independence be successful.●

ABORTION: A NATIONAL TRAGEDY

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 12th anniversary of the Supreme Court decisions legalizing abortion-on-demand in the United States. In solemn observance of these decisions, tens of thousands of concerned citizens have come to Washington, DC, to express their support for the right to life for all in our Nation. Many of the marchers have come great distances at their own expense, and should be commended for their efforts on behalf of the unborn.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my opposition to abortion.

In 1973, the Supreme Court went far beyond its constitutional role of judicial review, and began establishing—in effect legislating—the Government's policy on abortion. The controversial Supreme Court decisions, Roe versus Wade and Doe versus Bolton, overturned antiabortion statutes in all 50 States. In the 12 years since these infamous decisions, no legislature—State or Federal—has affirmed the right to an abortion.

Many constitutional scholars claim that the Justice first had to find—some say fabricate—the right to privacy in the 14th amendment in order to establish the so-called freedom to choose an abortion.

I would like to point out some of the obvious flaws in the argument justifying abortion. First, the right of privacy does not extend to all acts committed in private. Men who beat their wives usually do so in private, but no one would argue that they have a constitutional right to carry out such assaults.

Second, the freedom of choice doesn't apply to all choices made. Someone may choose to rob a bank, but he certainly doesn't have a right to that choice.

The Constitution states that our Government was established, among other reasons, to ensure justice. Therefore, the Government must move to secure and protect the rights of minorities, at times in the face of opposition from the majority. Proabortionists claim that polls show a majority of Americans favor legalized abortion. Without debating the accuracy of such polls, I would like to point out that during other eras in our Nation's history the majority have favored such things as slavery and racial segregation, which we now view as abhorrent.

As a Member of Congress, I have a constitutional obligation to protect the right to life for all Americans, regardless of their age or condition of dependency. I hold this view in light of the overwhelming medical evidence that the fetus is indeed a living human being. After all, the fetus is most assuredly alive, or an abortion wouldn't be necessary to kill it. And if it isn't human, what is it? A dog? A cow?

By resorting to Orwellian doublespeak, proabortionists have tried to discredit the humanity of the unborn child. Referring to the unborn as "tissue" or the "products of conception," they hope to hide the fact that abortion involves the taking of another human life.

The 15 million unborn children aborted since 1973 aren't the only victims of abortion, however. Women themselves have been victimized by this multibillion dollar industry. Witness the establishment of groups such as Women Exploited by Abortion [WEBA], an organization whose membership has grown by over 10,000 in less than 2 years. All of these are women who have been traumatized as a result of having an abortion.

Children, too, are among the victims. One of the slogans in the push to legalize abortion was, "Make every child a wanted child." It was said that if, by legalizing abortion, women could have only those children they wanted, we would eradicate child abuse. The past 12 years have proven just the opposite. Incidents of child abuse have risen, not declined.

The handicapped have also been the Court's victims. In the 1973 decision Roe versus Wade, Justice Blackmun set for the dangerous "meaningful life" argument. An increase in infanticide has been the result.

Just as tragic, those who espouse this quality of life mentality are telling the handicapped, the aged, and the infirm in our society that they are an inconvenience to others and are leading a life not really worth living. Such a utilitarian mentality led to the murder of 70,000 handicapped and aged individuals during the reign of Adolf Hitler.

Abortion is not merely a women's issue, as some claim. It is an issue of great concern to all Americans. That is why I support efforts to adopt a human life constitutional amendment, to affirm the right to life for all of us.

Unless the right to life is secure for all—born and unborn—it is secure for none. After all, in order to have the unalienable rights of liberty and the pursuit of happiness, one must first have life.●

FRANK O'ROURKE, ONE OF BASEBALL'S GRAND OLD TIMERS

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the New Jersey Sports Writers Association will honor Frank O'Rourke with its Hall of Fame Award for his extraordinary career as a major league baseball player, minor league manager, baseball scout, and sportsman over a period of 75 years. It is a career that included the Golden Age of Sports when Frank O'Rourke played with the great Ty Cobb, Bucky Harris, Tris Speaker, Walter "Big Train" Johnson, "Sad Sam" Rice, George Sisler, and other baseball legends.

He learned baseball on the sandlots of Elizabeth, NJ, before making his major league debut with the Boston Braves in 1912 at the age of 18.

Daily Journal sports editor Bill Kennedy wrote about Frank O'Rourke in a recent column, which I insert in the RECORD as follows:

A lot of highly complimentary things have been said about Frank O'Rourke over the years.

The Hillside resident spent 14 seasons in major league baseball, more years as a minor league field manager, and somewhere near half a century as a major league baseball scout.

The baseball playing life of Frank "Blackie" O'Rourke, as documented by the Baseball Encyclopedia, reveals that he was a .254 lifetime hitter as an infielder who played shortstop and second and third base between 1912 and 1931 for six teams—the Boston Braves, Brooklyn Robins, Washington Senators, Boston Red Sox, Detroit Tigers and St. Louis Browns.

With the Tigers in 1925 O'Rourke enjoyed the type of season which would have made him a millionaire today, batting .293 with 40 doubles, 57 RBI and scoring 88 runs. That feat was overshadowed by the fact that the immortal Ty Cobb batted .378 during that year for Detroit, but it was nonetheless a great season by any standards.

While he is not a Hall of Fame candidate as a player and never competed in a World Series, O'Rourke had a fine playing career. Twenty years elapsed between the day he played in his first major league game and the day he hung up his spikes. Not many professional players—of any era—get to stay around that long.

O'Rourke played his first major league season when he was 18, participating in 61 games for the Braves. They farmed him out after that year and after hitting .327 in consecutive campaigns for Toronto of the International League, he returned to the big leagues with the Robins, which were the forerunners of the Dodgers. He was a Robin for two years, a Senator for two seasons, with the Red Sox just one, the Tigers three and completing his career with five years as a St. Louis Brown.

After his playing career had concluded, he managed and scouted for the Cincinnati Reds for 15 years. Desiring to return to the area in which he grew up, O'Rourke was signed by the Yankees for whom he has served as a metropolitan area scout many, many seasons.

This must be O'Rourke's year for honors, because the New Jersey Sports Writers Association is going to present him with its Hall of Fame Award at its annual banquet February 3.

Acknowledging that 75 years is more than a great many people live, and a longer professional baseball career than that of three very good and durable players, it is remarkable that O'Rourke still is able to remain active in baseball. He is still seen regularly at New Jersey high school and college games, taking note of talent for consideration by the Yankees.●

DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining my colleague BUDDY ROEMER in introducing legislation to repeal an onerous requirement of our tax laws that has already begun to affect millions of tax paying Americans who use their automobiles for business.

One of the provisions of the 1984 Deficit Reduction Tax Act has caused considerable problems for taxpayers who take standard business deductions for business use of their cars. This provision was only a few pages from a tax bill that ran to almost 6,500 pages. It was overlooked by some Members, and thought by others to be insignificant when compared to the tax bill in its entirety.

While taxpayers in different areas face different headaches from this law, its requirement that individuals who take standard business deductions must substantiate their mileage by keeping a contemporaneous account of their travels is similarly burdensome to all taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, Congressman ROEMER and I have already been joined in introducing this legislation by over 50 of our colleagues. We invite others who have heard from their constituents about this new burden to join us in repealing this new requirement.

H.R. —

A bill to repeal the new substantiation requirements for deductions attributable to business use of passenger automobiles and certain other types of personal property

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 179(b) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 is hereby repealed and the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be applied and administered as if such section (and the amendments made by such section) had not been enacted.

DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

D. RECORDKEEPING

Present law

The taxpayer must substantiate any travel expenses by adequate records or other evidence corroborating his own statements. These records must show the amount, time, place, and business purpose of the travel expenses.

House bill

No provision.

Senate amendment

The Senate amendment extends present law substantiation requirements to all business use of an automobile and to the other property described above (i.e., property used for transportation, entertainment and recreation property, computers, and other property listed in regulations). The Senate amendment requires the maintenance of contemporaneous records.

The Senate amendment also requires that return preparers verify that adequate contemporaneous records have been kept supporting deductions before signing returns. The provision is effective with respect to property placed in service after March 15, 1984.

Conference agreement

The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment with modifications. Thus, taxpayers are required to substantiate by adequate contemporaneous records any investment tax credit or deduction with respect to the business use of listed property, traveling expenses (including meals and lodging while away from home as well as local travel) that are trade or business expenses or expenses for the production of income, for entertainment expenses, and for gifts. If the taxpayer does not have adequate contemporaneous records, no credit or deduction is allowed with respect to that item. If, however, these records are lost due to circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control, such as in a fire, flood, or earthquake, the conferees intend that taxpayers continue to have the ability, as they do under present law, to substantiate a deduction by reasonable reconstruction of expenditures (see Treas. reg. 1.274-5(c)(5)).

The conferees expect that these records will reflect with substantial accuracy the business use of the property. The records must indicate the business purpose of the expense or use, unless the business purpose is clear from the surrounding circumstances. With respect to automobiles, logs recording the date of the trip and the mileage driven for business purposes must be kept.

The requirement of the Senate amendment that return preparers verify that adequate records supporting all of these deductions have been kept before signing the return has been deleted. In place of that requirement, a return preparer must properly and fully advise the taxpayer of these contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements and obtain written confirmation from the taxpayer certifying that adequate contemporaneous records supporting these deductions and credits exist. If the return preparer does not obtain this written certification, the preparer may not sign the return. The conferees anticipate either that the content of this certification will be specified by the Secretary or that the Secretary will prescribe a form for this certification. The conferees expect that the Secretary will amend Form 2106 or any other appropriate form to require that the taxpayer directly indicate on his return whether the required records have been kept. This could be done, for example, by providing a box to check on the return.

The conference agreement also provides that any portion of an underpayment of tax attributable to a failure to comply with these contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements is treated as due to negligence in the absence of clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. Claiming a deduction or credit without the support of the required records is also potentially fraud. This is in addition to the loss of the credit and deduction which would occur under present law.

The conferees anticipate that the Secretary will draw the attention of taxpayers to these new recordkeeping requirements in the appropriate regularly issued Internal Revenue Service publications. To accomplish this, for example, the Service could describe these new recordkeeping requirements in the section of the instructions to the 1984 Form 1040 that highlights important tax law changes.

The compliance provisions are effective with respect to taxable years beginning after 1984.●

RAGING AGAINST "STAR WARS"

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the recent announcement from Geneva that the United States and the Soviet Union are planning to initiate new arms control talks on three important aspects of nuclear weaponry competition—strategic, or intercontinental systems, intermediate range systems, and antimissile or defensive systems—is encouraging; indeed, it is a step in the right direction. Secretary of State George Shultz is to be commended for not giving in the Soviet demands for immediate and unilateral concessions by the United States as a price for their returning to the negotiating tables.

One group of the upcoming talks will deal exclusively with defensive arms. It is important for all Americans to understand where the United States is "coming from" in this branch of negotiations, and what the reasons are for the President's desire to pursue research into the technological and policy implications of pursuing a ballistic missile defense system—his strategic defense initiative [SDI]. I, for one, applaud the President's decision to study this aspect of defense, and therefore highly recommend the following Op-Ed written by two well-respected strategic analysts, Leon Sloss and Seymour Weiss, taken from the Monday, January 7, 1985, edition of the Washington Post.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 7, 1985]

RAGING AGAINST "STAR WARS"

(By Seymour Weiss and Leon Sloss)

(Seymour Weiss is a retired ambassador and former director of the State Department's bureau of political-military affairs. Leon Sloss, a Washington consultant, is a retired director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.)

How is one to explain the passionate, sometimes almost frenetic, denunciation of the president's proposal for a defense against Soviet ballistic missiles? Even the label, "Star Wars," Seems designed to denigrate, to conjure up a vision of Hollywood production, a matter for ridicule, not serious national debate. While the critics scoff, the public seems to appreciate the commonsense approach of seeking to defend ourselves. What, after all, is the sin of attempting to develop a defense against Soviet attack?

Let us acknowledge at the outset that there are aspects to the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) that warrant healthy skepticism. This research carries a costly price tag of $26 billion. However, by today's standards of $100 million bombers and $5 billion aircraft carriers, the SDI costs—which are to be spread over more than five years—are not unreasonable if the research effort produces results that will improve the nation's security and that of our allies. We think it can.

It is also a legitimate matter of concern that some of our allies are deeply opposed to SDI. As ones who have discussed the issue with some of our NATO partners, we are persuaded that there is much confusion and misunderstanding on their part. Past experience also suggests that these concerns may, in time, be allayed if our diplomacy is patient and skillful. Such would already appear to have been the case with Margaret Thatcher.

It is also true that the most extravagant expectations for SDI may never be fulfilled. It is not unreasonable to be skeptical about whether a perfect defense will ever be developed. The president's hope that SDI will help to make nuclear weapons disappear from the face of the earth is surely utopian. Still, these are not ignoble goals, and at this stage neither supporters nor critics of SDI can speak with confidence about what technology and diplomacy may accomplish decades hence.

One must probe more deeply to comprehend the antagonism toward the SDI that has emerged from certain quarters. When one does, two underlying issues emerge. They have to do with nuclear strategy and arms control.

While declaring their confidence that SDI won't work, the critics, in fact, are fearful it will. At least they fear it will work well enough to call into question their preferred nuclear strategy. Most critics adhere to the school of mutual assured destruction (MAD). That emerged in the 1960s from the mind of Robert McNamara, who was then secretary of defense and is now one of the principal critics of strategic defense. His calculations convinced him that so long as millions of Russians and millions of Americans were at risk of nuclear attacks on the cities on each side, each would be deterred. In this view defenses were bad because they removed the hostages that assured deterrence. There was then, and there is now, much wrong with this thesis.

Not the least of the problems is that the Soviets never bought McNamara's strategy. They don't believe in city busting as the prime objective of nuclear strategy. Thus, it is not clear that such a threat is the one most likely to deter them. Indeed, the Soviets, despite McNamara's contrary prediction, spent massively to overcome America's lead in offensive weaponry, going well beyond any conceivable inventory justified solely in terms of the requirements for the MAD strategy. In time, many U.S. leaders came to the realization that MAD did not serve us well either, and U.S. strategy has, for more than a decade, under Democratic and Republican administrations alike, been moving away from this concept.

Since the Soviets did not believe in the MAD strategy, they refused to rely solely on offensive nuclear capabilities and in addition deployed impressive defenses. They have more than 10,000 ground-to-air defensive missiles and thousands of fighter aircraft to protect against our bombers. We have none of the former and pitifully few of the latter. They have deployed ballistic missile defense in the Moscow area that provides defense to their central government and party apparatus and to two-thirds of the heavily industrialized western U.S.S.R. They have an impressive civil defense system, which has concentrated on defending key government and industrial people. They have continued to harden and make mobile their ballistic missiles and command centers. As Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger recently pointed out, they have spent more on strategic defense than on strategic offense since the signing of the ABM Treaty.

In fact, the Soviets built their forces to support the strategy they have held to consistently, based not on targeting U.S. cities but the U.S. military establishment. As a result, they are today capable in a first strike (and their doctrine has always emphasized the importance of surprise) of reducing the U.S. retaliatory force to a relatively small fraction of its nominal strength. Thus, we could be left with a force that, while having some countermilitary capability, was most suitable for attacking Soviet cities, even though our own cities had not yet been attacked by the Soviets—an unenviable choice for any president. Under the circumstances, we might find our strategy, having failed to deter, would leave him with unbelievably stark alternatives: suicide or surrender. Even if such a foreboding scenario seems unlikely, its prospect casts dark shadows that can influence peacetime and crisis actions well short of nuclear war.

Why is it not a good idea to seek alternatives that avoid such a stark choice? Is it not worth a considerable effort to see whether some degree of defense might help ensure deterrence? If deterrence could fail, why shouldn't we try to protect ourselves as best we can? Must we accept for all time a strategy based on the threat of killing millions of innocent people—a strategy Catholic bishops have rightly denounced as immoral? Critics of SDI have no good answers.

The opponents of SDI have a second worry. They fear it would complicate arms control negotiations with the Soviets. One might have thought that the barren results of the past two decades of arms control negotiations would have given rise to second thoughts to those who would have us rely so heavily on them for our security. They are most concerned about protecting the "jewel in the crown" of arms control, the ABM Treaty of 1972.

When the treaty was signed, the United States dismantled its one system and sharply cut back on research and development, even though these were permitted. The Soviets have proceeded to complete a nationwide radar net; to complete deployment of the one permitted system; to create a production base that would permit rapid expansion of conventional but advanced ABM capabilities; and to conduct extensive research in precisely those advanced technologies that would be encompassed by the SDI program. They have fully exploited the possibilities permitted by the treaty while we have not, and most observers are satisfied they have actually violated the treaty limits, most notably in deploying a large radar at Krasnoyarsk.

Apologists for the treaty hesitate to acknowledge these realities. The Soviets, being realists, are unlikely to permit any arms control agreement to stand in the way of advancing Soviet interests, in most cases at the direct expense of the West. Indeed, the Soviets' recent initiative to draw the Reagan administration into new arms control discussion clearly appears to be based upon a desire to kill off SDI while leaving them as free a hand as possible to pursue their own ballistic missile defense and antisatellite efforts. Any objective review of arms control history will demonstrate this to be vintage Soviet arms control strategy.

Still, critics of SDI hang fast to the belief that they can talk the Soviets into adopting a mutually suicidal strategy, while engaging in arms control efforts that, to succeed, would require the Soviets to abandon not merely some weaponry of which they may be fond, but their most fundamental political objectives. For Soviet exploitation of military power—the one thing the Soviets are good at developing—is not just some minor aberration in otherwise reasonable behavior. The Soviets develop that power because they require it for purposes of political intimidation and, should that fail, for actual employment as they pursue their goal of a world pliant to Soviet views.

Under these circumstances, it is folly for us to place our security solely or even primarily on arms control. The notion that the Soviets through arms control negotiations are likely to abandon hard-won military advantages over the West is about as naive as was the 1960s prediction that they would not even try to match our nuclear capabilities.

As we have suggested, the current defense debate is not just about the president's Strategic Defense Initiative. It is about more fundamental issues: How can we best prevent nuclear war? How ought we to deal with the Soviet Union in a continuing adversarial relationship? How do U.S. nuclear strategy and arms control concepts fit into and support nuclear war deterrence and prevent the expansion of Soviet influence?

No one side in our internal debates has a monopoly on wisdom, and one wishes the critics of the president's SDI program would cease acting as if they did. Would it not be reasonable to see whether this research effort can come up with capabilities that may promise the West a safer, more promising future than total reliance on the threat of mutual destruction?

Even though the research may be only partially successful, as Weinberger has recently suggested, if we can develop and deploy defensive systems with capabilities more modest than a perfect defense, might that not be very valuable in strengthening deterrence? Even if defenses initially provided protection of valuable military assets such as land based ICBMs, bombers and command-and-control centers, might that not be preferable to proliferating generation after generation of new offensive weapons systems? Even if an imperfect defense could save "only" tens of millions of lives, is there not some merit in such a defense?

Finally, if we are successful in developing increasingly capable defenses against Soviet nuclear attack, might not this induce the Soviets to adopt a more forthcoming position on arms control? We cannot with confidence answer these questions positively. The prospects are not without merit, however, and it is to these issues that the 1985 defense debate should turn if it is to contribute to making the nation and its allies more secure.●

FAIR VOTING HOURS ACT

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, today I am introducing the Fair Voting Hours Act of 1985.

The purpose of this bill is direct. It establishes uniform voting hours nationwide so that all voters have the opportunity to cast their ballots in a Presidential election year before media projections of the results are made. Under my legislation, voters in Portland, ME, and in Portland, OR, will go to the voter's booth knowing exactly as much about the eventual outcome of a Presidential election.

As my colleagues know, the use of exit polls to project the results of elections is chipping away at the credibility of the electoral process. Research shows that some of our citizens are being dissuaded from voting in Presidential elections because they hear projections of the results before the polls close in their State. How many voters have been so discouraged is a subject open to debate. But what is not debatable is the fact that some citizens are discouraged from voting and that this obstacle to electoral participation is a barrier that we are capable of removing.

In recent months, there has been growing concern about this problem. Last fall, I wrote to President Reagan and Democratic candidate Walter Mondale asking both to pledge that they would make no statements on election night until polls closed in the West. Both men responded affirmatively to my request within a week, and both honored their pledges on November 6, 1984.

Last week, the House Elections Task Force announced that ABC, CBS, and NBC agreed to not use exit polling data to project or characterize election results in a State until the polls close in that State. The networks' agreement has paved the way for Congress to pass a uniform poll closing act. Such a law will be a perfect complement to the important pledge just made by the networks.

The key to a workable poll closing statute is to make it fair and simple to administer. I believe the legislation that I am introducing will do just that.

Under my bill, the voting booths would open at 8 a.m. eastern time and close at 11 p.m. eastern time. On the west coast, the voting day would begin at 5 a.m. and end at 8 p.m.

My legislation requires that on the east coast polls stay open 3 hours later than normal and on the west coast, polls open 3 hours earlier than normal. I have been told by local and State election officials that such a change in voting hours is practical and manageable.

My plan does not require the additional expense nor administrative hassles of proposals to adopt Sunday voting or 24-hour voting. With my plan we can keep the basic structure of the election systems in the various States and still address the issue at hand.

I have always said that to deal with this issue properly we need a two part package. The first part has to be the agreement of the networks to not characterize or broadcast results before the polls close in a State. The second part is a fair and simple national poll closing hours statute. We are now half the way to putting this package in place.

Several of my constituents have recently pointed out that all Americans watch the Super Bowl and learn who won at the same time. I think that is the way it should be for Presidential elections, too.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, beginning with the year 1988, presidential general elections shall be held, with respect to the continental United States, during the period beginning at 8:00 o'clock ante meridiem, eastern standard time, and ending at 11:00 o'clock post meridiem, eastern standard time, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November and all polling places for such election in the continental United States shall be open for that entire period.

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "continental United States" means the States of the United States (other than Alaska and Hawaii) and the District of Columbia; and

(2) "presidential general election" means the election for electors of President and Vice President.●

REPEAL VEHICLE LOGGING REQUIREMENTS OF TAX REFORM ACT OF 1984

HON. GLENN ENGLISH

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to repeal and lift off the recently implemented passenger vehicle logging requirements which have fallen like axed timber onto American taxpayers.

Section 179 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 imposes and offensive burden upon thousands and thousands of American taxpayers. In order to verify that a vehicle is not owned primarily for personal use, drivers operating business vehicles must now fill out extensive driving records each time they operate such a vehicle. This is the so-called contemporaneous record keeping requirement. What this boils down to is that the Government is basically requiring certain taxpayers to hand over to the IRS an itemized listing of how an individual spends his day. I am afraid that this law could ultimately itself become a vehicle to drive Government surveillance into American private lives.

I am hearing from taxpayers throughout Oklahoma's Sixth District who adamantly object to these personally offensive restrictions. Not only is the requirement a serious threat to privacy, it also clearly contradicts efforts to simplify tax provisions and efforts to reduce paperwork.

I voted against passage of this measure, and I feel the best solution how is to repeal the measure before further damage is done. Consequently, I am introducing legislation to repeal subsection (b) and amendments thereto of section 179 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984. The text of this repeal legislation follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and house of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (b) of section 179 of the Tax Reform Act of 1984 (relating to contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements and other compliance provisions) and the amendments made by such subsection are hereby repealed.

(b) The Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be applied as if such subsection (b) (and the amendments made by such subsection) had never been enacted.●

A TRIBUTE TO DETECTIVE RICHARD WELLS

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, true dedication and valor are qualities that are found in very few people. Long Islanders, however, do not have to look very far to find a man who exemplifies these qualities. Detective Richard Wells of the Nassau County Police Department has dedicated much of his life to protecting our community, and for that we express our gratitude. It is a privilege to bring the accomplishments of Detective Wells to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Most recently, Detective Wells was honored by his peers in the Nassau County Police Department Detectives' Association as Detective of the Year at a gala "Law Enforcement Night" in Great Neck, NY, on October 26. I was pleased to meet Detective Wells on this occasion and to express my personal thanks to him for his ongoing contributions to protecting the safety of Nassau County residents.

As a uniformed patrolman and a detective, Detective Wells has received countless words of praise from residents of Nassau County whom he has personally helped over the years. In performing his functions as a law enforcement officer, whether it be comforting a victim in distress, recovering stolen property, or solving homicide cases, Detective Wells has consistently exhibited true professionalism, sincerity, and compassion. On several occasions, he has been commended for his work by Samuel J. Rozzi, the Nassau County Police Commissioner, and Denis Dillon, the Nassau County District Attorney.

Perhaps his greatest triumph thus far as a law enforcement officer involved his tireless efforts to solve a murder case which had remained unsolved for 6 years. On the night of March 9, 1975, Ralph Porcelli was murdered in a robbery attempt outside Roosevelt Raceway after cashing in winnings of $1,800. After years of relentless investigating, Detective Wells was able to close the case in 1981 and finally bring those who committed the crime to justice.

In a touching letter to Detective Wells, the family of Ralph Porcelli expressed its gratitude for all he had done on the family's behalf. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues excerpts of that letter:

Dear Detective Wells: Words will never be sufficient to express the gratitude that we, the family of Ralph D. Porcelli feel for you. . . .

Your compassionate treatment of all of us during the early stages of your investigation is something that we will never forget. . . .

As time dimmed our hopes, your resolution never seemed to waver in spite of what appeared to be an insurmountable passage of years. Please be assured that all the arduous, painstaking, repetitious and selfless work that you have put in will never be considered "routine" by us. . . .

Richie, we all wish you continued success in your career and every happiness in your personal life. The words are not enough, but thank you.

Mr. Speaker, Richie Wells is truly an exemplary law enforcement officer whose efforts on behalf of the people of Nassau County should serve as a fine example to those who have dedicated themselves to serving the public. I ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to this very special man.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION MAKING PENSION RIGHTS OF RETIREES A MANDATORY TOPIC OF BARGAINING

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I introduced legislation which would protect the rights of retirees in collective bargaining agreements. This legislation, which has been introduced in past Congresses, has never advanced beyond the hearing stages.

Mr. Speaker, in 1971, the Supreme Court ruled in Allied Chemical and Alkali Workers of America, Local Union No. 1 against Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company Chemical Division that retirees' benefits are not, under the meaning of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, a mandatory subject of bargaining. The Court's decision overturned an earlier decision by the National Labor Relations Board, which held that the benefits of already retired employees were a mandatory subject of bargaining as terms and conditions of employment of the retirees themselves. The NLRB ruled, in general, that an employer's midterm unilateral modification of such benefits constituted an unfair labor practice.

The legislation which I have introduced would adopt the view of the NLRB and thus overturn the Supreme Court's decision. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act requires as a mandatory subject of bargaining, terms and conditions of employment. Under the Supreme Court's decision, the rights of retirees—including pension and health benefits, are apparently not included in terms and conditions of employment even though the NLRB held that the benefits of already retired employees vitally affects the terms and conditions of current employment.

H.R. 309 would make bargaining with respect to retirement benefits for retired employees a mandatory subject of bargaining. In addition, it is illegal to make unilateral changes in an area considered to be a mandatory subject of bargaining. Without my legislation, conditions affecting retired employees can be altered unilaterally by labor or management.

I believe that this legislation is necessary to protect the rights of retired employees who, in many cases, helped build the company for which they worked. To that extent, they should be able to share in the future successes of that company. Retired employees often live on fixed incomes in an inflationary economy. The cost of living has risen steadily in recent years and the cost of hospitalization has more than doubled in some parts of the country. Yet pension and hospitalization benefits under collective bargaining agreements have tended to lag behind costs in part because the adjustment of these benefits remains a permissive rather than a mandatory subject of bargaining. Absent legal compulsion, some employers and unions have voluntarily continued their practice of bargaining with regard to retirees' benefits, but others have taken the opportunity to stop serious bargaining in this area as well as to make unilateral changes in retirees' benefits.

Mr. Speaker, in years past, the Education and Labor Committee has held hearings on legislation similar to this. I would urge that this legislation go beyond the hearing stage and to a markup by the full committee. I urge support for this legislation.●

JORDAN'S STANDING IN THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to a December 28 Reuters dispatch from Jordan.

According to the news account, the Jordanian Government has approved death sentences for 15 of its citizens. Their crime? Selling their property on the West Bank of Israel to Israelis. Jordanian law forbids the sale of property to Israelis, and the penalty for such high treason, as it's called, is death.

Jordan is supposedly one of the moderate Arab States in the Middle East, but this type of inhumane treatment of its people is, in my view, inexcusable. I can only imagine that it will hurt Jordan's standing in the international community.

JORDAN DOOMS 15 FOR SELLING TO ISRAELIS

AMMAN, JORDAN, December 28 (Reuters).—The Jordanian Government has approved death sentences for 15 people convicted of selling their property on the Israeli-occupied West Bank to Israelis, the official Jordanian press agency reported today.

It said the 15 had been sentenced in absentia by a special court. It did not specify their present whereabouts.

Jordanian law forbids the sale of property in the occupied territories to the Israeli "enemies," with such action considered high treason and punishable by death.

The court voided the sales and ordered the confiscation of the defendants' property, the press agency said. It said the Cabinet approved the sentences on Thursday.

The defendants, including two women, were from the occupied West Bank areas of Tulkarm, Ramallah and Bethlehem, the agency said, although it did not give their nationalities. The West Bank was ruled by Jordan until the Israelis captured it in 1967.●

THE 19TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE CUBAN EXILES' DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, 19 years ago, on January 23, 1966, a group of heroic Cuban exiles met together in Key West, FL, to sign a declaration of freedom. This document was a manifestation of their firm commitment to the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and human rights, which had been denied to the Cuban people under the brutal totalitarian rule of Fidel Castro, as well as their desire that free and democratic institutions, which would guarantee these rights, would one day be reestablished in their homeland.

The thirst for freedom and opportunity, which forced these brave people to flee their beloved homeland and make new lives in exile, has motivated the members of the Cuban community to achieve success and prominence in the United States. Their contributions to their adopted country have been considerable, not the least of which has been their unwavering dedication to the democratic principles upon which our country was founded.

As we mark this anniversary, I ask that our colleagues reflect for a moment upon the idealism and hope that is embodied in this declaration of a courageous people who chose the hardships of exile in order that they might live in freedom.

The text of the declaration of freedom follows:

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

In the City of Key West, Monroe County, State of Florida, United States of America, we, the Cuban exiles in the United States, in the name of God Almighty, and speaking both for ourselves and the oppressed people in Cuba, the Martyr Island, do say:

That on January 1, 1959, the slavery yoke that came from Europe and was extinguished in Cuba at the end of the 19th century , was resumed.

That those responsible for this high treason to our Fatherland and to our People are just a score of traitors who, usurpating the Government of the Country, have been acting as mercenary agents for the Sino/Soviet imperialism, and have surrendered to that imperialism our Freedom and our Dignity, also betraying the American Hemisphere.

That as a consequence of this high treason, those who are usurpating the Power in Cuba (as they were never elected by the People), are imposing a regime of bloodshed, terror and hate without any respect or consideration to the dignity of the human being or the most elementary human rights.

That in their hunger for power, these traitors, following the pattern of totalitarian regimes, are trying, within Cuba, to separate the Family, which is the cornerstone of actual society, and at the same time, are poisoning the minds of the Cuban children and youth, in their hopes of extending the length of time for this abominable system.

That the rule of the Law has been wiped out in Cuba, and it has been replaced by the evil will of this score of traitors, who are acting under orders from their master, the Sino/Soviet imperialists.

In view of the aforegoing, we declare:

First: That the actual Cuban regime is guilty of high treason to our Fatherland and to the ideas of the Freedom Revolution which was started on October 10, 1868.

Second: That this score of traitors who have committed treason against our Fatherland, in case they survive the downfall of their regime, will have to respond, even with their lives before the Ordinary Courts of Justice of Cuba.

Third: That as the Nobel Cuban People will not ever surrender, because that Nation was not born to be slaves, we, the Cuban People, hereby make the present declaration of freedom.

We hereby swear before God Almighty to fight constantly, until death comes to us to free Cuba from Communism.

The fundamentals of this Revolution for Freedom are.

First: God Almighty, above all things, in Whom we believe as the essence of Life.

Second: The Fatherland, with all of its laws, traditions, customs and history as a spiritual value, only surpassed by the concept of God.

Third: The Family, as the cornerstone of the Human Society.

Fourth: Human Rights, for each and every citizen, regardless of race or creed.

Fifth: The Law, as the foundation for the proper development of the Human Society.

Sixth: Democratic Government, with its three independent branches: Legislative, Executive, and Judicial.

Seventh: Representative Democracy, through the exercise of Universal Suffrage, Periodically, Free and Secretive, as the expression of Popular Sovereignty.

Eighth: Freedom of Worship, Freedom of Teaching, Freedom of the Press and Free Enterprise.

Ninth: Private Property and Ownership, as the basic expression of Liberty.

Tenth: The improvement of living conditions for both rural and city working masses, with the just and necessary measures, keeping in mind the legitimate interests of both Labor and Capital.

Eleventh: the derogation and eradication of anything which is opposed to the political and religious fundamentals aforementioned and specifically, the abolition of Communism and any other form of totalitarian manifestation.

Signed and sealed in Key West, Florida, on the 23d day of January, 1966.●

THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION ADJUDICATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, today I am proud to join the gentleman from California, Mr. EDWARDS, and 87 of our colleagues in introducing the Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act. This bill will correct one of the most glaring inequities in the laws of the United States, the denial of the right to press legal claims for veterans' benefits in a court of law.

This denial is a serious infringement on the rights of a class of citizens to whom we should owe a special debt of gratitude. Our veterans have served us well, protecting us and our laws, yet they are denied the protections of our laws which the rest of us enjoy. We in Congress are powerfully obligated to restore their right to full legal equality.

The Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act will correct the half-century-old inequity by allowing veterans the same right to judicial review of decisions of the VA that other citizens enjoy in appealing the decisions of virtually every other court and administrative agency of the Federal Government. The right of judicial review was codified for all other Americans by the Administrative Procedures Act of 1946, but veterans were unfairly and arbitrarily excluded from the act's protection.

Our bill also corrects another offense against veterans' rights. Under another antiquated and grossly unfair statute, veterans are prohibited by law from obtaining services of legal counsel worth more than $10. This outdated law effectively prevents veterans from independently pressing their lawful claims against the VA. No other group of Americans is systematically deprived of access to legal protection. Veterans surely deserve more from the Government they have so faithfully defended.

The Veterans' Administration is unique among the courts and administrative agencies of our Government in the finality of its decisions. Judicial review and legal counsel might be unnecessary for veterans if the VA, unlike every other court and administrative agency in the land, never erred in its decisions. Unfortunately, the VA sometimes does err. When it errs against itself, though, it has the right to seek legal redress against individual veterans, and to spend any amount of money for legal counsel in pressing its claim. Only when the error favors the VA, and aggrieves the individual veteran, do the rusty shackles of old laws prevent the error's correction in a court of justice.

The small number of citizens against whom these old laws discriminate in no way mitigates the magnitude of their injustice. We must affirm the fundamental values of equal rights and due process, and in fairness restore the protection of basic legal rights to those whose military service has helped to protect the rights of all other Americans.

Mr. Speaker, the Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act will affirm our values and restore to veterans their proper rights. For the sake of fairness, I look forward to early consideration and passage of this important bill.●

A TRIBUTE TO THOMAS LEDERER

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Thomas Lederer, who while still a young man, has become one of the most respected citizens of New York's Third Congressional District. I am proud to call Tom my good friend and to bring his many contributions to our local community, the town of Huntington, to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives.

A life-long resident of Huntington, Tom has worked tirelessly for many years to help make the town a better place to live for his family, friends, and all of its residents. For this, he deserves our sincere gratitude.

In addition to his full-time position as general manager and corporate vice president of Sportique Motors, Ltd., a local Jaguar-Peugeot dealership, Tom is an accomplished writer. He has served as a reporter for Huntington's primary local paper, The Long Islander, since 1962, has been its sports editor and has written a host of its major feature articles. Tom is also presently a news correspondent for the New York Times and writes feature stories of particular interest to Long Islanders for the paper's Long Island Weekly section.

An avid and competitive sportsman, Tom has been a long-time volunteer commissioner of Huntington's softball league. In fact, he wrote the league's charter, rules and policies and has worked closely with the town's recreational department to ensure the success of the league and maintain a sense of fair play throughout the softball season. My own experience has confirmed that this is truly one of the most thankless tasks in Huntington.

In 1983, Tom developed the idea of a road race to benefit the Huntington Food Council. During the past 2 years, Tom has served as race director of the annual Sportique-Peugeot Food for Friends Five-Mile Foot Race. The race has been an enormously popular event and more importantly, has raised many needed funds to provide food for Suffolk County's disadvantaged population.

Most recently, Tom organized the Huntington Station Merchant's Association. This civic group was put together in an attempt to improve living and business conditions in the area. The association has already made significant strides toward this goal.

Tom is an active member of the Huntington Chamber of Commerce, the New York State Auto Dealers Association, the Press Club of Long Island as well as the Huntington Station Merchants Association.

Mr. Speaker, too often we overlook the accomplishments of people who simply strive to be citizens in the best sense of the word; men and women who spend hundreds of hours of their time not for personal advancement or gain, but rather for the basic good of their fellow citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the family and friends of Tom Lederer in paying tribute to this outstanding citizen and only hope that his fine example of civic involvement will inspire others in my district and throughout the Nation.●

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1985, marks the 66th anniversary of Ukraine's proclamation of independence, and the 65th anniversary of the Proclamation of the Act of Union, whereby all Ukrainian lands were unified in one state. We are all too painfully aware of the brief time Ukrainians knew independence prior to the brutal Soviet annexation of their homeland in 1920. Since that fateful year, the Soviet occupation has unleashed virtual torrent of harsh repression and death. Soviet authorities have persecuted and imprisoned millions of innocent people over this period and during the early 1930's Stalin imposed an artificial famine on Ukraine which took the lives of between 7 and 10 million people.

The Soviet Union today continues to deny basic human rights to Ukrainians and its policy toward this conquered land and its captive people is brutal and relentless. In spite of this, the traditions, culture, and national character of the Ukrainian people live on both in their native land, and in the hearts of Ukrainians everywhere.

The Ukrainian American community is actively involved in maintaining the rich cultural identity of Ukraine and it is important on this occasion to commend it for its worthy efforts. Its clear voice in support of the aspirations of the Ukrainian people serves as a powerful moral booster for the 5 million Ukrainians still living under Soviet occupation.

Let there be no doubt that those of us in the Congress will not allow the continuing struggle of the Ukrainian people to be forgotten. The lengthy nature of the list of sovereign states that have fallen victim to Soviet aggression since 1920 will not in any way diffuse attention given to the plight of Ukraine. The methods and objectives of the Soviet Union have changed little since the invasion of Ukraine in 1920. But, nor has the determination of the Ukrainian people wavered during the time. On the occasion of this anniversary, let everyone be reminded of the injustice which is still visited upon the Ukrainian people, and of the need to continue the vital struggle to achieve a world free of captive nations.●

THE 99TH CONGRESS AND THE CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, as the 99th Congress assembles to begin the challenge of addressing an unprecedented deficit and an uncertain economy, we, as its Members, will also face issues which concern all of humanity—the rights of fellow human beings around the world. The people of these United States share a special relationship with the peoples of the Earth, and, thereby, bear a special responsibility as well.

We are a Nation of immigrants from every corner of the Earth. We have been enriched by the cultures of the world, and strengthened by the commitment of these individuals to a free and just society. Our society does not easily turn its back to suffering and injustice at home or abroad.

The Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry, devotes itself to bearing witness for individuals who are unjustly persecuted by their Government. Soviet Jews live in a state where the Government actively promotes anti-Semitism. Made unwelcome in their own country, many Soviet Jews have no alternative but to choose to leave the land of their birth. It is an outrage that once they have declared their intention to leave, they are then held captive and harassed by that same Soviet Government.

The Congressional Call to Conscience gives us a mechanism by which we, as Members of Congress, can continually bring attention to the plight of individuals trapped in this abusive cycle. We can tell the world their names and their stories. If their own Government will not hear them, the rest of the world will.

Last year, 148 Members of this body joined Congressman LARRY COUGHLIN, Chairman of the Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry, in focusing attention on the plight of Soviet Jewry and Soviet refuseniks. Americans and the world have heard some of their names and know a little of their stories. They are individuals who share the same ideals and aspirations which Americans share—the desire to live in peace with their fellow beings, pursuing a better life for their children and contributing to the welfare of society with their God-given talents.

I know that all Americans appreciate the leadership of Congressman COUGHLIN and his predecessor Congressman TIM WIRTH on this issue. Numerous Americans have devoted countless hours to helping Soviet Jewry as well. They should know that we in the Congress also respect and welcome their individual and collective efforts on behalf of Soviet Jewry. The Union of Councils for Soviet Jewry has over the years been an outstanding leader in this regard.

This year, the Members of the 99th Congress have already responded enthusiastically to the effort to keep the issue of Soviet Jewry and the right of emigration from the Soviet Union before the court of world opinion. I would urge all of my colleagues to join the Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry so that not a single legislative day may pass without the mention of one of these victims.●

NATIONAL CHILD PASSENGER SAFETY AWARENESS DAY

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, over the years significant steps have been taken to expand the use of a product that has been proven to save children's lives, child restraints in motor vehicles. Forty-nine States and the Distict of Columbia have enacted some type of law requiring children to be placed in a safety seat while in a car. Congress has passed laws to provide monetary incentives for States in this regard and to establish a National Child Passenger Safety Awareness Day to increase public awareness regarding the lifesaving value of child restraints. These positive actions have been successful in expanding the use of safety seats and promoting the widely accepted and statistically proven fact that safety restraint devices reduce child fatalities and crippling injuries from motor vehicle accidents.

There is, however, an important area that has not yet been addressed. State laws do not require car rental companies to provide their customers with safety seats and in some States temporary vehicles are exempt from child restraint laws. While some of the larger agencies do furnish a limited number of seats at certain locations, not all companies do, and a driver is not always guaranteed this service. I feel that if virtually every State in the country has recognized the value of establishing child restraint laws, it seems both logical and consistent that these devices should be used in rented cars and thus, readily available from rental agencies.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to close the gap in present law I am today reintroducing a bill to require motor vehicle rental companies to provide child restraint systems in rented motor vehicles to all travelers who need this service. This measure is important if we are to provide across the board protection for our young people while traveling in automobiles. My bill has been endorsed by Physicians for Automotive Safety, the American Academy of Pediatrics, Independent Insurance Agents, and the Consumer's Union.

As the parent of two small children, I have become increasingly sensitive to the statistics that demonstrate the need to protect my youngsters by using safety seats whenever they travel with me and feel that a rented car should be no exception. The statistics are staggering and point out that automobile accidents are the No. 1 cause of child mortality. For instance, more children under the age of 5 are killed or crippled in automobile accidents than by the seven common childhood diseases; automobile accidents are the major cause of epilepsy; and between the years 1978–82 3,400 children were killed and 250,000 were injured in automobile accidents. The truly tragic fact is that studies show that 90 percent of these injuries and deaths are preventable by the simple and correct use of child safety seats.

The bill I am reintroducing today is consistent with laws already in place that are intended to achieve universal usage of child safety seats in order to protect children—our most precious resource—from unnecessary harm. I urge my colleagues to join with me to in this truly worthwhile and lifesaving effort to further advance the use of child safety seats.●

FREEZE ALL SPENDING—INCLUDING SOCIAL SECURITY COLA'S AND DEFENSE

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I recently informed the Republican leadership that I cannot and will not support the position that exempts Social Security cost-of-living increases from consideration as we address the budget deficit. In fact, I'm absolutely amazed that anyone believes that the deficit can be addressed in any meaningful way without freezing cost-of-living increases and defense spending, or even worse, that deficits don't really matter.

The gallons of red ink that drench our books not only pose a grave danger to continued economic growth, but also put a crushing and unfair burden on our children. It is astonishing to realize that a child born in 1985 may have to pay as much as $10,000 in extra taxes, over a lifetime, just to meet the interest payment on this year's Federal budget deficit. If we don't act to control the deficit today, tomorrow it will destroy the opportunity and upward economic mobility that have always been the hallmark and genius of our economic system.

Accordingly, I will support a freeze on all spending programs next year—including defense and all Government cost-of-living adjustments, including Social Security. There is simply no other way to address the huge Federal deficit projected for the next 5 years and beyond.

Fairness dictates that all elements of our society share in the burden of solving this problem. In my discussions with hundreds of Americans, rich and poor, young and old, black and white, I have yet to find one who would not sacrifice if all others would also. If our leadership in Congress and the White House can find the courage to do what is right and necessary, I know the American people will respond as they have always responded in crisis.

I know my position risks retribution by special interests. But we can't continue to serve every special interest at the expense of a strong and dynamic economy that serves us all. The American people understand this. In fact, this was the exact message of the 1984 election: Americans are looking for courage and leadership in their elected officials.

It is time to stop the political gamesmanship and posturing that have dominated Washington for so long and get on with governing the country fairly and for the benefit of the American people as a whole. That includes our children and generations to come, who will bear the burdens or enjoy the benefits of the policies we set now.●

IN TRIBUTE TO FRANK DIAS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a few thoughts about a man whose outstanding career is surpassed only by his sacrificial service to the community. This special American is Frank Dias.

Frank Dias has served with the California Department of Motor Vehicles since 1948. He began as a laborer and was promoted through the ranks to his current position as manager of the central inquiry unit. Because of his exceptional dedication and service on the job, he has received letters of commendation from the FBI, the Department of Justice, and several police departments.

But today I wish to recognize Frank Dias for more than his efforts as manager of the central inquiry unit. I wish to recognize his outstanding dedication to the Sacramento community and to the Portuguese-American community in this area.

Mr. Speaker, through the dedication and efforts of Frank Dias, through his radio program "Portuguese Echoes", and through his ability to convince people of the need to give, he has helped raise more than $150,000 in voluntary contributions for worthwhile charitable causes. These funds have gone to aid earthquake victims in the Azores after the 1973 disaster that left thousands homeless and have been used to feed people who would have otherwise gone hungry. They were used to provide water to a mountain village in the Azores where hundreds of families lived but water remained miles away.

Frank Dias has also used his radio broadcast to find jobs for non-English speaking people and has interceded with authorities to help ill people from the Azores who want to come to the United States for proper medical attention. Frank Dias is truly a special ambassador for the United States.

Mr. Speaker, Frank Dias' retirement this December will be a loss to the California Department of Motor Vehicles. But I am sure he will continue to take on, as he has done in the past, the fight for the needy. The Sacramento community and our Nation can only benefit from outstanding citizens like Frank Dias.●

OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT TO BE REVITALIZED AND EXTENDED

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to revitalize and extend the authority for agency Inspectors General and the President to pay cash awards to employees whose disclosures of fraud, waste, or mismanagement result in cost savings to the Government.

Last year, both Houses passed H.R. 5646, a bill very similar to the one I am introducing today. H.R. 5646 failed to become law because objection was heard to a unanimous consent request in the House of Representatives to accepting the Senate amendment in the final moments of the 98th Congress.

The bill I introduce today does not contain the Senate amendment which was found objectionable.

The cash awards program was established by section 1703 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35) and authorized for a 3-year test period which expired on September 30, 1984. This new legislation extends until September 30, 1988, the cash awards program so as to provide needed time to more fully assess its value and effectiveness. The bill requires the General Accounting Office [GAO] to issue a report prior to March 16, 1987, containing recommendations on whether the awards program should be continued. In addition, the bill responds to a request of the Department of Defense that the Inspector General of DOD be permitted the authority to grant cash awards to members of the military services who make cost savings disclosures. Last fall, the Committee on Armed Services, the Department of Defense, and the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service worked together to develop an amendment to title 10, United States Code, which establishes the program for the military while protecting the chain of command.

The administration has said that it supports a 3-year extension of the cost savings awards program. I hope Congress will move quickly to adopt this important legislation.●

RED BARBER—"THE VOICE OF THE DODGERS"

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, Today I want to honor a man who, for millions of Americans, will always be remembered as "The Voice of the Dodgers." That man is Red Barber. As one who represents a district in Brooklyn, I can say that from 1939 to 1954, Red Barber was for us, "The Voice of Brooklyn."

Red Barber has been on the air for 54 of radio's 60 year history. His professional career began in 1934 as an announcer for the Cincinnati Reds. After 5 years with the Reds, Mr. Barber moved to New York, where he broadcast Brooklyn Dodger games for the next 15 seasons.

During this time Barber acquainted the locals with such homey expressions as "sitting in the catbird seat." And anyone who remembers the "ol' Redhead" can't forget that when Barber says the bases are F.O.B. that meant the bases were "full of Brooklyns". Mr. Barber was a poet in the broadcasting booth. He put "rhubarb" into the baseball vocabulary, and had teams and players tearing up the "peapatch." He could make a 10-to-1 game interesting with his little insights and his little truisms about the players.

My constituents are extremely proud of this man, about whom one of the worst things ever said was that Red Barber was too fair! This fairness was tested in 1947, when Branch Rickey broke the color line in baseball and in American sports, by hiring Jackie Robinson. Barber says he was determined to report what he saw. Robinson would do the rest. Jackie Robinson was obviously satisfied with Barber's ability to report fairly. On June 30, 1984, the American Sportscasters Association voted Red Barber into the Hall of Fame. Rachel Robinson, Jackie Robinson's widow, accepted Barber's award.

In his years as a sportscaster Barber covered 13 World Series, 4 All-Star baseball games, 1 Sugar Bowl, and 5 NFL championship football classics. His career included a number of firsts. He broadcast the first night game in baseball history. Later he worked baseball's first televised game and covered games at Ebbets field during the 1940's and early 1950's when the Dodgers were first carving out a special place in the hearts and minds of baseball fans everywhere. Such a career leaves a man in demand!

Today, Mr. Barber makes his home in Tallahassee, FL—though we in Brooklyn, still count him as one of our own. He is currently working on his seventh book. And he has returned to his origins, performing on radio before a third generation of listeners. Mr. Barber says of his present radio program, "We're turning the clock back to the early days of radio, with its immediacy, spontaneity and excitement." It would be true excitement if we could hear a few seconds of his call to Cookie Lavegetto breaking up Bill Beven's no-hitter in the 1947 World Series: "Well, I'll be a suck-egg mule," but even without it, Red Barber is still in the "catbird seat."●

OUTSTANDING WORKING WOMEN

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to 10 special women who have been recognized by Glamour magazine as the "Outstanding Young Working Women of 1985." These 10 extraordinary young women provide excellent examples of the great strides women have made in entering a wide range of career fields.

I am most pleased to note that a woman from my own congressional district was chosen by Glamour magazine as one of these outstanding working women. Evelyn Horn of Hartford, CT, is the only woman in New England who directs a correctional facility for men that has over 500 inmates. As warden of the Hartford Correctional Center, Evelyn oversees a $5 million budget, supervises over 150 employees and evaluates the prison's custodial and rehabilitative programs. In addition to her professional responsibilities, Evelyn serves on the board of a local women-in-crisis center and actively promotes community participation in prison programs.

I would also like to share with you the names, careers, and residences of the other nine women recognized by Glamour for their achievements:

Judith Berger, President of MD Resources, Inc., Miami, Florida;

Maria Correa-Freire, Research Assistant Professor, Department of Biochemistry, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, Tennessee, currently a Congressional Science Fellow in Congressman Norman Mineta's office;

Marie Farrell-Donaldson, Auditor General, City of Detroit, Detroit, Michigan;

Donna Jean Hrinak, Chief of Political Section, United States Consulate General, Sao Paulo, Brazil;

Michelle Hughes Koehler, Airborne Military Intelligence Officer, United States Army, Fort Bragg, North Carolina;

PAPERWORK REDUCTION ACT OF 1985

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced legislation to eliminate a new paperwork requirement that was imposed pursuant to the Tax Reform Act of 1984.

One provision of the 1984 act attempts to restrict tax avoidance that is based upon the deduction of vehicle expenses when such expenses are not truly related to business use. This new provision requires taxpayers to keep adequate contemporaneous records in order to receive routine business deductions. My bill would repeal that provision. While we all want to ensure that everyone pays their fair share of taxes, the provision is neither realistic nor workable.

The Internal Revenue Service recently proposed regulations to enforce this recordkeeping requirement. The IRS would require the taxpayer keep excessively detailed vehicle logs in order to receive formerly routine deductions. All of this information must be recorded at or near the time the property was used.

In an attempt to reduce the deficit, Congress has sought various ways to enforce stricter compliance with tax laws. The law, however, can go too far. The requirement for compliance can become too burdensome and, eventually, counterproductive. I believe Congress unwittingly created such a burden last year, and we should, therefore, undo the potential damage caused by the IRS.

My bill simply repeals section 179(b) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984. The law would revert back to what it was before the enactment of last year's tax bill.

Enactment of the legislation would not relieve taxpayers of reasonable recordkeeping responsibilities. Repeal of this particular section means that taxpayers would be required to maintain adequate records or sufficient corroborating evidence to document claimed deductions, just as they did before.

I do not want to perpetuate a tax loophole or promote tax evasion. I simply want to protect taxpayers from an unreasonable requirement to keep excruciatingly detailed logs of mileage, times, dates, and purpose of travel.

It is unfair to burden with unnecessary paperwork businessmen and farmers and other taxpayers who routinely use vehicles for business purposes. It is unfair to turn productive businesspeople into unproductive bookkeepers for the IRS. It is unfair for them to spend even more time coping with Government redtape. Companies that faithfully follow these regulations have no time to do anything else. This country cannot afford these types of senseless regulations.

I do not believe Congress intended to create an unreasonable paperwork burden on those who use vehicles for farming and business purposes. I believe that rather than go back and clarify our intent so there is no chance the IRS will misunderstand it, we would be better off restoring the previous law.●

LIMIT RETROACTIVE TAX RULINGS

HON. ED ZSCHAU

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 625, a bill to protect taxpayers against the Internal Revenue Service applying retroactively administrative and judicial rulings that would have an unfavorable impact. This is the same bill that I introduced in the 98th Congress.

Our legal system has traditionally determined the legality of an action based on the laws that are in effect at the time of the particular action. In contrast, the IRS has enforced its rulings retroactively. Even when a taxpayer files a tax return that is accurate and conforms exactly to the existing instructions, the IRS has applied subsequent regulations reflecting later court decisions or a change in an administrative ruling that requires taxpayers to pay additional taxes. This has happened even in those cases when the taxpayer has received written advice from the IRS confirming the accuracy of the original tax treatment.

I believe such actions are wrong and unfair. But that's what can happen as the tax law stands today. For example, two of my constituents took a deduction for certain educational expenses in 1977. The form 1040 instructions at the time stated clearly that the particular deduction was allowed. Then, in 1980, new IRS regulations were written which reversed that instruction. When my constituents were audited in 1981, the IRS recomputed their 1977 taxes using the new instruction and demanded several thousand dollars in additional taxes. Since I introduced the bill in the 98th Congress, similar examples have come to my attention.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 625, would modify section 7806 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 that covers the retroactive application of tax law. This change would prevent the IRS from applying to the detriment of a taxpayer any administrative or judicial interpretation of a provision in the tax law or regulations made subsequent to the time that the taxpayer had relied on that provision to compute his or her taxes. My bill would not modify the authority of the IRS to dispute returns that relied on tax instructions in an unreasonable manner, nor would it eliminate the authority to apply tax law changes in a retroactive manner. I do not believe that the complete elimination of such authority is warranted or desirable. For instance, there may be cases when taxpayers can recover overpayments of taxes through retroactive remedies.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting H.R. 625. At a time when we are seeking ways to reform the Tax Code, we should also look for ways to make its implementation fairer. H.R. 625 would do so.

The text of my bill follows:

H.R. 625

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow taxpayers to disregard certain retroactive administrative and judicial interpretations of such Code

H.R. 50 "PORT DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1985"

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of this 99th session of Congress, I introduced H.R. 50, the Port Development Act of 1985. This bill is being cosponsored by every Member of the Maryland delegation. We introduced it early because we feel we've waited 15 years for the money to dredge our harbor and we didn't want to wait another day in our efforts to finally get this project approved. The Port Development Act of 1985 provides a uniform basis for future sharing between the Federal Government and deep-draft commercial ports of the costs of constructing and maintaining port projects and providing necessary port-related services.

In 1970, Congress authorized a 50-foot channel for the Port of Baltimore. Fifteen years later, our port and our citizens are still waiting for the first bucket of deep dredging. We must act, and we must act now. This bill will bring Baltimore closer to that day when we can compete in imports and exports.

Baltimore is one example of the national need for this legislation. The national interest requires the promotion, operation, maintenance, and development of a viable and competitive domestic marine transportation system. The recent technological improvements in vessel construction and cargo handling—with the objective of increasing productivity, efficiency, energy conservation, and marine transportation—are reflected in the use of larger, deeper draft vessels. It, therefore, is necessary for increased capital investments and operating expenditures by the Federal Government and commercial ports for navigation improvements, the expansion of port facilities, and the extension of necessary port-related services.

The time has come for Congress to act to save the ports of this Nation. If we are to remain competitive in the world market, we must act now. The Port of Baltimore knows all too well the price of congressional inaction. The Port Development Act 1985 addresses the real need for port development. I encourage my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

MILITARY APPRECIATION DAY

HON. ROBERT E. BADHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, all across this land citizens of the United States of America appreciate the sacrifices of those among us who serve their country in time of war and peace. With this in mind, I would like to call the attention of this honorable body to an event in the 40th Congressional District on February 9, 1985.

This special occasion is known as Military Appreciation Day, and the citizens of my district in Orange County, CA, have banded together to honor a number of outstanding young men and women who have served their country well in peacetime and several others who have received the Nation's highest honor for wartime service, the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Honored at this event will be the Sailor of the Year, Marine of the Year, Coast Guardsman of the Year, and Airman of the Year. At least four recipients of the Medal of Honor will be present for recognition of their selfless service in wartime.

The Newport Harbor Post No. 291 of the American Legion is responsible for this superb civic effort for our veterans and men and women in uniform. Elected public officials throughout Orange County are joining me in this salute to our men and women, plus top-rank commanders of military units which are based in the area in and around the 40th District.

As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, who has spent countless hours visiting military installations at home and around the world, talking to our people in uniform, I have the utmost respect and admiration for those who have chosen to serve their country in our Nation's armed services.

I salute Newport Beach American Legion Post No. 291 for its efforts in bringing our Nation's service men and women and our past heros together on February 9.●

LONG BEACH CITY COUNCILMAN JAMES H. WILSON

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Congress is only one of many elected bodies in this country that is beginning a new legislative year this month, and I would like to pay a tribute to a member of one of those other legislative bodies, Long Beach City Councilman James H. Wilson. He will be 57 years old on January 30 and is beginning his 15th year of continuous service to the citizens of Long Beach, including two terms in the demanding position of vice mayor.

Jim Wilson was first elected to the city council in 1970 to serve the remaining 2 years of a retiring councilman's term, and was reelected in 1972 to a full 4-year term. He was subsequently reelected to the council in 1976 and in 1980, and served with such distinction that, in this last election, he received an overwhelming mandate to continue representing the residents of the sixth councilmanic district for another 4 years.

Jim is an exceptionally capable spokesman for the people of Long Beach, and it is always a pleasure to see him in Washington. Whether it be an airport noise problem, more Federal funding for low-income housing, medical needs of the elderly, or any other issue involving the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government, his is always well prepared, forceful in his presentation, and makes his points clearly and concisely.

Councilman Wilson has been a resident of Long Beach for 40 years and has been one of our community's most active citizens in both local and national organizations. He is actively involved in both the League of California Cities and the National League of Cities, and is a past president of the Southern California Association of Governments and of the National Association of Regional Councils. On the local level, he has served on the board of directors for the Boy Scouts, United Way, NAACP, and St. Mary's Hospital. He is currently a member of the faculty of the black studies department at

California State University at Long Beach.

My wife Lee joins me in wishing him a very happy birthday, and all the best in the years ahead to him, his wife Audry, their children Cynthia and Ronnie, and their four grandchildren.●

EXEMPT AGRICULTURAL VEHICLES FROM DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation that would exempt agricultural vehicles from the burdensome and unnecessary paperwork that the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 now requires. While I applaud reasonable legislative efforts that are made to reduce the deficit and close certain unfair loopholes that now exist in our tax laws, I certainly do not believe that the present record keeping requirements for our farmers is the answers. This IRS regulation was printed in the October 24, 1984, Federal Register.

For example, one of the provisions in the regulation requires each user of a farm vehicle, such as a pick-up truck, to keep an excessively detailed log, or other similar record for each use of that vehicle. Farmers need less paperwork not more, their main interests should be focused on crop production not on needless and detailed record-keeping and filing.

I understand that Senator JAMES ABDNOR has recently introduced legislation similar to mine, and I support his efforts to eliminate this unnecessary regulatory requirement that has been imposed on our farmers.

I believe in proper accounting for farm business purposes but this new regulation is inefficient, time consuming, and burdensome to those hard working men and women on our Nation's farms. Therefore, I am introducing this bill which will exempt any vehicle primarily used for farming purposes from this new IRS regulation.●

MULE APPRECIATION DAY

HON. JIM COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on October 26, the American mule will be 200 years old.

That's right. George Washington, the Father of our Country, started the whole thing himself when he received two full-blooded jacks from King Charles III of Spain. The mules bred by George began a long tradition of service to our Nation in both peacetime and war. Mules have served us in agriculture, mining, transportation, and other endeavors.

Since mules have been such an important part in the building of this country of ours, we shouldn't let this historic bicentennial go by. I am introducing a resolution designating October 26, 1985, as "Mule Appreciation Day." Please join in recognizing the contributions of these strong and sturdy denizens of our land by cosponsoring this resolution.●

REPEAL OF CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDS PROVISION OF 1984 TAX LAW

HON. W.G. (BILL) HEFNER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, numerous provisions of the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act were not considered in the House when tax legislation was debated but were added by the Senate and adopted later by the conference. In a bill so voluminous as this, it is not surprising that onerous requirements slipped through without adequate consideration on the part of Members as to their impact.

One provision which is causing a great deal of concern in my district, and I am sure elsewhere across the Nation, is the requirement for on-the-spot records to be kept on the use of mixed-use property such as vehicles. While I have no specific quarrel with the requirement that business use of automobiles, and so forth, constitute 50 percent or more for business purposes in order to be eligible for the investment tax credit and the accelerated cost recovery tax deductions, I do not believe that Congress intended the extremely burdensome paperwork requirements imposed by the section of the new tax law which mandates contemporaneous record keeping.

Our aim should be to simplify the Tax Code and to make compliance less costly for small businesses and farmers. Yet this provision places the greatest burden on this group and will require many of them to add new personnel to keep these records. Farmers who employ unskilled labor will be particularly burdened. Many of these employees drive pickup trucks associated with the farming operations; yet many of them are not able to keep the required records adequately. Many business operations make it absolutely essential for their service personnel to be on call and thus these employees must have access to the company vehicles at all times.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is imperative that we repeal this section of last year's tax bill immediately, and I am introducing legislation that will return the Tax Code to its original status with respect to the mixed business and personal use of business-owned property. I urge the House Ways and Means Committee to give this matter prompt and favorable attention.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, once again it is time to participate in the congressional call to conscience on behalf of our Jewish brothers and sisters in the Soviet Union. It is a time for solidarity. A time to let Soviet Jews know that we have not forgotten.

Since the late 1970's, there has been a virtual cutoff of Soviet Jewish emigration. At the same time, there has been an enormous increase in anti-Semitic propaganda. Jewish cultural, educational, and employment opportunities have lessened. Soviet authorities interfere with the free flow of mail. If the Soviets refuse to abide by the precepts on human rights laid down in the Helsinki accords for their Jewish citizens, they will refuse to honor the basic human rights of their other citizens.

The U.S. Congress has the same message for those struggling for human rights everywhere but particularly for those struggling within the Soviet Union, you are not forgotten and you will not be forgotten.

For the past several years, cynics have said that congressional pressure on the Soviets to improve their human rights record is meaningless. I disagree.

Members of Congress, acting on behalf of the American people, must not let the Soviets' human rights violations to go unnoticed. We have an obligation to call the world's attention to Soviet violations of international agreements it purports to subscribe.

As Federal legislators our voices will be heard. We can call attention to the real heroes in the Soviet Union, the refuseniks and prisoners of conscience who have paid such a great price for what we in the United States take for granted.

The names of Shcharansky, Nudel, Slepak, and Lerner will be remembered for good, long after those of their oppressors have passed into oblivion; 40 years ago, Franklin Roosevelt said:

> We have learned that we cannot live alone, at peace; that our own well-being is dependent on the well-being of other nations, far away. We have learned that we must live as men, and not as ostriches, nor as dogs in the manger. We have learned to be citizens of the world, members of the human community.

We have learned that lesson well. When the Soviet Union learns that lesson, human rights will be assured.●

CABRILLO CIVIC CLUBS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the 50th anniversary of the Cabrillo Civic Clubs of California and the contributions which the club has made to communities throughout the State.

The Cabrillo Club is an important club to Portuguese-Americans. Not only does it enable the Portuguese-American to understand his heritage and be proud of it, but it also encourages the Portuguese-American to become actively involved in his community and local organizations. The club as a whole has been responsible for donating many hours of service to local hospitals and community programs as well as raising hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Cancer Society, Heart Fund, Polio Foundation, and many other worthy causes.

One of the objectives of the Cabrillo Club had been to promote better education among the youth by establishing a college scholarship fund. Students of Portuguese descent with outstanding academic qualifications and who otherwise cannot afford to attend college are awarded scholarships.

The Cabrillo Club has served to be an important organization for Portuguese-Americans. Not only has it provided a link to their past, but it has encouraged them to be an active part of the future. I would like to congratulate the membership of the Cabrillo Club for 50 years of outstanding service.●

TRIBUTE TO LYLE HALL

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a close friend and a valuable member of our community, Mr. Lyle Hall. From his appointment to the Los Angeles City Fire Department in 1962 to the present, he has distinguished himself by his consummate professionalism and his dedication to duty.

In 1971 he was elected to the United Firefighters Negotiating Team where he established the first memorandum of understanding between the city of Los Angeles and the UFLAC. In 1973 he was again appointed to the negotiating team. In 1974 he was elected to the UFLAC executive board. In 1976 he was appointed State representative for the International Association of Firefighters.

Aside from his dedication to his profession and his professional association, his career has been marked by instances of exceptional bravery. He has been awarded both the Fire Department Medal of Valor and the California State Firemen's Association Award of Valor.

It is our loss that he has chosen not to run for reelection this year, but we take heart in knowing that his counsel, his wisdom, and his experience is always available to his friends and colleagues in Los Angeles.●

TRIBUTE TO VAN DER AA BUS LINES, INC.

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to commend a company in my congressional district that is celebrating 60 years in the school transportation business on January 19 this year. Their success demonstrates what is possible in our country with hard work and good service.

Van Der Aa Bus Lines, Inc., was started in 1925 by Mike Van Der Aa with one school bus; expanded to a three-bus operation by 1940 and a seven-bus operation by 1950. In 1960, the company had grown to a 15-bus operation serving 12 schools. The company made its first acquisition of another bus company in 1962 with the purchase of DuPage Motor Coach, Inc., and has since acquired six additional companies. John G. Van Der Aa became a partner in the business in 1962 and his brother, Terry, in 1973. John and Terry purchased the entire bus operation in 1973, and at this time Mike and Kate Van Der Aa retired.

The orginal Van Der Aa Bros. school coach business has expanded from a family-operated, one-bus company in 1925 to a multicompany organization with 1,000 buses and over 1,100 employees. I know my colleagues join with me in commending this fine company on the occasion of their 60th anniversary.●

MAJ. GEN. CARL D. WALLACE, 10 YEARS AS ADJUTANT GENERAL

HON. WILLIAM HILL BONER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the great State of Tennessee is proud to acknowledge the making of Volunteer State history. Maj. Gen. Carl D. Wallace, State adjutant general of the Tennessee National Guard, has served in that capacity for the last 10 years, longer than any other adjutant general.

He celebrated that honor on Wednesday, January 16, 1985.

Born in Stewart County, TN, Carl D. Wallace attended Austin Peay University and the University of Tennessee. He was on active duty in the Armed Forces from 1950 to 1954 and served in Korea with the 45th Infantry Division. He began his National Guard service in 1955, commanded several units and was the Guard's Command Information Officer before his appointment as adjutant general in 1975. He was appointed again by Gov. Lamar Alexander in 1979 and 1983.

A career journalist, Major General Wallace is on military leave as editor of the Lebanon Democrat in Lebanon, TN.

He leads more than 18,000 full-time and volunteer citizen-soldiers and oversees a budget of more than $200 million as he administers the Air Guard, Army Guard, Bureau of War Records, and the Tennessee Emergency Management Agency.

Known for his outgoing personality and award winning smile, General Wallace is recognized statewide for the outstanding job and leadership in keeping Tennessee's first line of reserve fit and able and ready to respond at a moment's notice.

His abilities aren't just known within the State's boundaries. Major General Wallace has also received the Legion of Merit Award, one of the highest that can be presented during peacetime.

It was presented by Lt. Gen. Charles P. Graham, commander of the 2d U.S. Army.

The people of the Fifth Congressional District of Tennessee applaud General Wallace for his service and dedication and wish him only the best in the years to come.●

JOHN F. HENNING, CALIFORNIA LABOR LEADER, HONORED

HON. MERVYN DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 22, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to call to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives, a man who through many long years of dedicated service to laborers in California has earned their enduring respect, admiration and love. That man is John F. Henning. Before some members of this great body were born, John Henning was already at work bringing fair treatment and decent pay to the laborers of California. Way back in 1949, John became research director of the California State Federation of Labor, AFL-CIO. At the same time he served as administration assistant to Neil Haggerty, then secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO.

Those first 10 years he spent in organized labor were anything but unnoticed. His work earned him such regard that he was appointed director of the California State Department of Industrial Relations in 1959—a post in which he distinguished himself. His expertise was so highly regarded in fact that in 1962 he was asked to assume the coveted post of U.S. Under Secretary of Labor. For 6 years he served with honor in that position.

He worked so well with disparate groups and was so adept at reconciling differences that his natural diplomatic tendencies became obvious to President Johnson who made his Ambassador to New Zealand. Clearly, though, John Henning's first love was and is the American worker. In 1970 John surrendered his ambassadorship to become executive secretary-treasurer of the California Labor Federation, AFL-CIO. California and California workers have been the better for John's decision to return to their service. For 15 years now John Henning's name has been synonymous with organized labor. As the executive officer of a labor organization boasting almost 2 million of California's workers as members, it is an understatement to say that John has played a key role in seeing that California laborers receive their fair share of the wealth of a State which would be the 10th most prosperous nation in the world were it to exist independently of the United States.

John represents the best America has to offer. He has given of himself in every way imaginable: As an advocate for laborers, as a civil servant and as an official representative of our Nation. But I would like to emphasize to my colleagues that John has not been content with the activities of what might be called his working life. He has sought to lend his talents to the shaping of young minds by serving in his spare time in some very important leadership roles in higher education. Most prominently, perhaps, he has been a member of the board of regents of the University of California—which I regard as the premiere public institution of higher education in the United States—since 1977. He has also had a long and warm relationship with his own alma mater, St. Mary's College in Moraga, CA. He has served as president of that institution's alumni association and has been a member of its board of trustees. A grateful St. Mary's recognized his contributions to the institution with an honorary doctor of laws degree, one of several he has received. As if that were not enough, he has also served as a member of the board of regents of Lone Mountain College in San Francisco.

At the end of this month John Henning's life of spectacular achievement is to be honored by those to whom he has given so much. This year, the Third Annual California Laborer's Salute Dinner will be a tribute to John F. Henning. I consider it a high honor to join the AFL-CIO in their tribute to one of this Nation's outstanding citizens. John, thank God you were born a Californian.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, January 24, 1985

The House met at 11 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. NATCHER].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
January 23, 1985.

I hereby designate the Honorable WILLIAM H. NATCHER to act as Speaker pro tempore on Thursday, January 24, 1985.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

Rev. Charles Mallon, permanent deacon, Holy Family Church, Mitchellville, MD, offered the following prayer:

Father, predispose our hearts and minds to the urgent needs of the Nation. Help us to order our priorities to meet these urgent needs. Allow the heartfelt prayers of the Nation, offered to You on our behalf, to find in us a responsive force eager to do Your will.

We acknowledge that all authority comes from You. And express our gratitude for the shared participation You have extended to us. Grant that You will find us worthy servants now and forever.

We ask this through Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 1. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of Congress to receive a message from the President on the State of the Union.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1985

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

There was no objection.

NOTICE

To Members of Congress and congressional offices:

Beginning with the 99th Congress, the biweekly, greenbound edition of the Congressional Record will no longer be published.

A newly-installed automated binding system at the Government Printing Office now provides a daily edition of the Record with an adhesive cover. This product not only has a longer shelf life, but also has identifying information printed on its spine for easier reference use. The biweekly, greenbound edition of the Record provides no additional information or other features that cannot be found in the daily edition. As such, its publication is now a needless duplication of effort. Elimination of the biweekly edition will save the Congress approximately $250,000 in annual production and distribution costs.

Members who maintain the Congressional Record for office reference are advised to save copies of the daily edition.

Later in the 99th Congress, two alternative formats of the Record will be offered to congressional users: (1) an on-line electronic version, along with the Congressional Record Index, offered through regular congressional computer services; and (2) a microfiche version of the daily edition, available from the Government Printing Office.

By order of the Joint Committee on Printing.

FRANK ANNUNZIO, Chairman.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
January 23, 1985.

The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from the White House at 4:00 p.m. on Wednesday, January 23, 1985 and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the first annual report of the National Endowment for Democracy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, January 24, 1985.)

CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that today a bipartisan group of Members of the House of Representatives have introduced the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985.

This bill, when enacted, will reverse the unfortunate decision of the Supreme Court in the Grove City case. This passed the House overwhelmingly in the last session and failed in the Senate because of a filibuster. The same bill will be introduced today in the Senate. It is a simpler bill. It is a good bill, and the principle of the bill, of course, is that Federal money shall not be used for discrimination against the aged, against the disabled, against minorities, or against anybody else; that if you want to accept Federal funds, an institution or a State or a city, you do not have to accept them, but if you accept them, you better not discriminate, because this law says you cannot do it.

ADJOURNMENT FROM MONDAY, JANUARY 28, 1985, TO WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1985, AND HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday next, it adjourn until 11 a.m. on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LET EACH STATE REGULATE ITS OWN SPEED LIMIT

(Mr. HANSEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, in 1974, Congress temporarily abandoned States rights and passed legislation creating a national speed limit of 55 miles per hour. That legislation later became permanent.

Since that time, there has been much debate on keeping the 55 miles per hour shackles on the States. Most recently, in a National Research Council study, it was suggested that speed limits could safely be raised on some rural interstate highways.

What the council is saying is that driving conditions across the Nation vary, so why can't speed limits vary? The absurdity of the law struck me on a trip from Washington to Utah across the long stretches of roads through Wyoming and Nebraska. I had my cruise control set, and about the only form of life I saw was an occasional jackrabbit. But there I was dawdling along in a car designed to go much faster and on a road designed to accommodate faster cars. However, if my cruise control had been set at 61, I could be cited for a traffic violation. Why are we making dishonest citizens out of everyone? Why does the support for the double nickel that we hear so much about disappear when we take to the highways?

Let me say that I am not advocating, nor do I have the right to advocate, the repeal of the 55-mile-per-hour limit. Being a States rights issue, that is something that each State must decide. Those who argue that this measure would be unsafe on the crowded eastern highways fail to realize that they would be the ones making the decision. And that's exactly my point. It's time to cut the strings the Federal Government has on our States and put the power back where it belongs—with our States, as it should be. It's time to let each State regulate its own speed limit. The bill I am introducing would do just that.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, today, the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985 was introduced. It is an important piece of legislation that has bipartisan support and simply redresses the civil rights reverses that this country has undertaken since 1964.

The Federal Government must take the lead and set an example in eradicating discrimination in this country. This legislation simply clarifies title 6 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title 9 of the Educational Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975.

The message is very simple in this legislation. It says that "if you are going to discriminate, don't do it with taxpayers' money."

I urge the passage of this important legislation that has been fostered by our colleagues, the gentleman from California [Mr. HAWKINS] and the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. Speaker, I include with my remarks a press release of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, dated January 24, 1985, as follows:

CHAIRMAN BILL RICHARDSON CALLS ON OTHERS TO SUPPORT THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

"The Federal Government must take the lead and set an example in eradicating discrimination in this country," stated Representative Bill Richardson, (D-NM) and chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. "That is why I am joining my colleagues today from the Women's Caucus and the Black Caucus in urging bipartisan support of the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985."

"It is now in the hands of Congress to define the scope of coverage in this restoration of four major civil rights statutes. This legislation clarifies Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975." added Richardson.

"I firmly believe that the American public wants to work individually and collectively to remove all vestiges of discrimination from our society." he said. "But to accomplish this task, we, as a society, need a strong legal code with enforcement capability."

"Last year, the members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus voted overwhelming in support of this concept, only to see the legislation held up in the Senate by last minute maneuvering. It is my hope that this year we can move quickly to enact this legislation into law."

THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

This year's bill seeks the same result we sought to achieve in 1984—the restoration of four major civil rights statutes—Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Age Discrimination Act of 1975—to the broad scope of coverage which the Supreme Court in Grove City College v. Bell, 104 Sup. Ct. 1211 unduly narrowed.

To achieve this goal, each of the four laws is amended—and they are amended in exactly the same way. However, in order to answer the criticism that S. 2568 was too complex, and, therefore, unclear, we have taken a different approach this year.

The definition of the term recipient, which was the core of S. 2568 and was used in lieu of the term "program or activity" is not included in this year's bill. Instead the term "program or activity" (the phrase narrowly interpreted by the Supreme Court in Grove City) is retained and a definition of that term is added to each of the four laws.

Our definition of "program or activity" is simple and clear. It sets out three important standards for determining coverage under these laws which are consistent with the prior coverage:

1. When a state or local government agency or department receives federal funds, the entire agency or department is covered.

2. When a university, higher education system, local education agency, or other elementary and secondary school system receives federal funds, the entire entity is covered.

3. When a corporation, partnership, or other private organization receives federal funds, the entire entity is covered.

The same institution-wide principles used to determine coverage for the state and local government, educational institution and corporate categories will also be used to determine coverage for any entity which does not fit one of these three categories.

The bill will also make clear that when a state or local government receives federal financial assistance for distribution to agencies, only that unit (e.g. the Governor's office) to which the funds were extended, and those agencies that actually receive funds, would be covered.

The bill also includes last year's amendment to the enforcement sections of the four statutes which is designed to insure that the pinpointed fund termination remedy is retained.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. MILLER of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1985, I was unavoidably detained in my office and missed two rollcall votes.

Had I been present for rollcall No. 5, I would have voted "nay." Had I been present for rollcall No. 6, I would have voted "yea."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these statements appear in the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

ERDREICH CALLS FOR RECORDKEEPING REPEAL

(Mr. ERDREICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, overregulation by the Federal Government has been a major reason for a decline in productivity and innovation by businesses in Jefferson County, AL, and across the Nation. The new IRS regulation requiring taxpayers to keep extensive records of the use of private vehicles for business purposes is just another example of Government policy that works to discourage, rather than encourage, expansion and increased production by business.

I have received many letters from businessmen and women across Jefferson County expressing their outrage at this increase in business regulation.

The Tax Reform Act of 1984, which I opposed, added this new paperwork requirement. This new redtape mandate is an unnecessary and wasteful burden on businesses and should be repealed.

I have introduced legislation in the House that would repeal these provisions in the tax bill and return to the eligibility criteria before 1984, requiring only that the taxpayer maintain adequate records or have other sufficient evidence corroborating his own statement of vehicle use.

Government policy should be about the business of promoting growth and productivity, not paperwork and regulation. This IRS regulation is an example of Government overkill. Its repeal will allow business in Jefferson County and the Nation to concentrate on producing jobs and economic activity, rather than increased recordkeeping.

INTRODUCTION OF ARMS CONTROL RESOLUTION

(Mr. KRAMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker as President Reagan said in his inspiring inaugural address, the United States and the Soviet Union must rid the world of the threat of nuclear destruction and create a security shield—a star shield—over the Earth, a shield that will not kill people but destroy weapons and help denuclearize the world's arsenals.

These goals will be realized only if the Nation unites behind our President in the forthcoming arms control talks.

So today, I, together with a bipartisan group of colleagues, have introduced Concurrent Resolution 35 voicing strong congressional support for the President's commitment to achieve deep, lasting cuts in offensive nuclear weapons and, at the same time, to substitute for them a star shield—a phased-in buildup of nonnuclear strategic defense systems.

As the President said in his inaugural:

> We seek another way—a far better way. For the sake of every child in every corner of the globe, we seek, one day, total elimination of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth.

Please join us in this historic effort.

THE 12TH ANNUAL MARCH FOR LIFE

(Mr. COBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week I participated in the 12th annual march for life held in this city. Over 71,500 people marched for the purpose of bringing national attention to the terrible tragedy of abortion.

I feel that most of our national leaders are out of touch with the people on this vital issue. Because of well organized lobbying activities by proabortion groups, Congress has shielded itself from the horrible reality of abortion. These proabortion groups represent only a small fraction of our society.

Mr. Speaker, when 71,500 citizens brave frigid weather to march from the White House to the Supreme Court, I think we as leaders of this free country should get a clear signal. Abortion is a matter of life and death for millions of unborn children.

WHAT EVER BECAME OF REAGANOMICS?

(Mr. McEWEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, the final report card on Reaganomics is in, and as the Washington Post reported, the "U.S. economy stages its best year since 1951." Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post has given Reaganomics straight A's for jobs, inflation, interest rates, and economic growth.

The American economy has created more jobs in the past 15 months than have been created in all of Europe in the past 15 years. Inflation is at its lowest level since the 1960's. Interest rates are half what they were 4 short years ago and going lower; $1.54 gasoline and long lines have been replaced by 99-cent gasoline at 24-hour service stations.

Mr. Speaker, compassion is getting a grip on the inflation that was robbing our Nation's poor and elderly. Compassion is an economy creating millions of new jobs for the unemployed.

Low inflation, declining interest rates, more new jobs, increasing real net income, and growth for all Americans—that is fairness, I say to the Members of the House. That is Reaganomics, and now you know the rest of the story.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS RESTORATION ACT OF 1985

(Mr. JEFFORDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I could not be more pleased that the first bill I am introducing with others as ranking Republican member of the Committee on Education and Labor is the bipartisan Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985.

I am even more proud as a Vermonter, for Vermont has been a leader in this field over the centuries. Vermont was the first State to do away with slavery. It was the first State to put in women's suffrage. It was the first State to pass workmen's compensation. These are among many of its "firsts."

I am also pleased because my grandmother was an activist on women's issues back at the time when women's suffrage was passed.

I believe it is virtually important that we give this bill a strong push early in this session. It is a bill that should be passed expeditiously, without fanfare or controversy. It plows no new ground. It only restores rights previously granted by Congress and revoked by an overly narrow interpretation by the Supreme Court.

We know from last year's experience that legislation to restore those civil rights will only be passed if there is an active effort every step of the way by a broad coalition of supporters in Congress. I think we have such a coalition, and it is well represented in this room.

Last year I remarked that Congress will not have great cause to congratulate itself if the legislation is passed but will have cause for deep embarrassment if we do not adopt it. Today we have an opportunity to avoid embarrassment. Let us reaffirm congressional intent to assure that the original legislative will of this body is no longer frustrated.

REPUBLICAN CHALLENGER GAINS IN INDIANA VOTE RECOUNT

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, today marks the third week that the people of the Eighth District of Indiana have been without representation because the majority party in this House, in my judgment, wantonly refused to seat in this body the duly elected and certificated winner of that election, Mr. Rick McIntyre.

As of today, in the recount procedure that is going forward, all recount commissioners have completed their tallies. In one county, Warrick, the report is to be made to the judge perhaps by today. In another county, Vanderburgh, the recount commission will report to the judge on Friday. It has completed its work. In two other counties, Greene and Gibson, litigation may be resolved as early as next week.

Taking into account the report of the recount commissioners only, Mr. McIntyre has increased his lead to 415 votes.

Mr. Speaker, when the recount is completed, it is my intention to give the House a chance to repudiate its terrible error and to remove the injustice that it has given to the people of the Eighth District of Indiana.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO CORRECT THE "NOTCH" EFFECT IN SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. WORTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, for several years now, citizens in this country who were born between 1916 and 1922 have been discriminated against by social security law. In 1977, Congress passed legislation containing a new benefit formula to correct imperfections in the 1972 amendments to the Social Security Act. Unfortunately, in correcting one mistake, Congress created another: the famed "notch" effect.

As a result of the "notch" effect, two people who worked the same number of years with equal contributions to the Social Security system and who retired the same year may nevertheless receive vastly different retirement benefits simply because one was born in 1916 and the other in 1917. This inequity has been caused by an inadequate transition formula from benefits as granted under the 1972 amendments to those granted by the 1977 amendments.

To help smooth the transition to the new system, the 1977 Social Security amendments provided that the retirement benefit for persons age 62 in 1979–83 would be equal to the higher of the benefit computed under the new system or a special transitional benefit. The transitional provision was intended to avoid adversely affecting persons nearing retirement age who would not have had time to adjust their retirement plans.

As indicated above, however, and as attested to by hundreds of letters from people born between 1916 and 1922, the transition formula needs adjustment. The 1977 amendments exclude wages earned after age 62 by those born after 1916 from the computation of benefits. Combined with the high inflation rates at the turn of the decade, this has caused a larger than anticipated short-range differential between benefits received by those born in 1916 or before and those born in 1917 or after. In the worst case scenario, the differential may be as much $110 per month.

Today I am introducing a bill that addresses this inequity. This bill establishes a new transitional formula that will reduce or eliminate the current notch problem. It also eliminates the disincentive to work past age 62 that is contained in current law.

The 1977 amendments made the mistake of trying to resolve too quickly the problems caused by the 1972 amendments. The transition contained in my bill will phase out early in the next century and will provide a smooth and fair transition. It will even out the notches created by current law, preventing all but a few small notches under even the most adverse economic projections.

This is a matter of extreme importance for senior citizens born after 1916. I urge my colleagues to take prompt action on this corrective bill.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order speech today by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I speak today again on the plight of Soviet Jews and on efforts of Americans to spotlight that plight. I bring to the attention of this House the beginning of a significant effort in Texas and call further attention to human rights abuses in the Soviet Union.

The B'nai B'rith lodges of Dallas have announced their "adoption" of the city of Kishinev, a community of 40,000 individuals in the Moldavian Republic. Kishinev is the capital of the Moldavian Republic and before World War II, the Jewish community there was quite large, about 50,000 persons. By the end of the war, over 10,000 Jews had been killed by the Nazis, and since then the Communists have further attempted to eliminate Judaism from Kishinev.

Glen Paul Freedman, president of the B'nai B'rith Council of Greater Dallas, expressed the view that the various B'nai B'rith lodges participating "will be the voice of Jews in Kishinev, who have no right to speak out for themselves." He added that the lodges will, in effect, "be their extended family—that part of the Jewish family fortunate enough to live in freedom."

With emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union now reduced to a few individuals, the efforts of groups such as B'nai B'rith are essential. Their activities, coupled with those of Members of Congress who have committed themselves to an improvement in the circumstances of Soviet Jewry, have become crucial to the long-term status of Jewish emigration to the West and the preservation of Jewish culture and religious practice in the U.S.S.R.

I served as cochairman of the 98th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry. I am currently planning to visit the Soviet Union to gain a firsthand understanding of the situation of Jews there. Based on my involvement in Soviet Jewry issues, it is clear that events in Dallas, whether they be an "adoption" of a Soviet town, a candlelight vigil expressing concern over restrictions on Jews in various parts of the globe, or a letter to the Soviets from Members of Congress, do have a direct, positive impact. Soviet officials do notice the spotlight of world opinion.

Today, I wish to commend the latest effort by the Dallas B'nai B'rith to demonstrate support for Soviet Jewry in both a direct and personal way. I am encouraged by such activities and extend to the Dallas B'nai B'rith my commendations. With this adoption of Kishinev, the members of B'nai B'rith of Dallas demonstrate their understanding that we who live in freedom have an obligation to reach out to those who do not. No man or woman is truly free when others remain slaves.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 2

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I introduced, for myself and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KINDNESS], a resolution (H. Con. Res. 2) to provide improved structures and procedures for congressional oversight of the Federal regulatory process and for congressional review of agency rules, and for other purposes.

The intent of the Congressional Regulatory Oversight Improvements Resolution of 1985 is to strengthen the structures and procedures by which Congress oversees Federal regulatory activities, to enable Congress to better fulfill its constitutional responsibility for the manner in which the laws it writes are implemented. In particular, the resolution seeks to respond to constitutional issues raised in connection with recent Court decisions relating to traditional legislative vetoes.

In fashioning this resolution, we have relied upon two powers which have generally been the greatest strengths of Congress, and particularly of this House. The Constitution reserves absolutely to each House the right to determine the rules of its proceedings and it mandates that no moneys may be paid out of the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations. These are among the strongest powers of Congress, and I believe they are appropriate tools for fashioning improvements in congressional oversight of the Federal regulatory process.

Mr. Speaker, I should stress that House Concurrent Resolution 2 is the product of careful thought and thorough examination. Over a period of years, the gentleman from Ohio and I have worked closely together, from our respective positions on the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Rules, to try to fashion a responsible system for regular and systematic review of the regulations written by the Federal Establishment.

Many of the features of this resolution have been in discussion for several years. However, it has seemed appropriate to defer action during the last Congress to assure that Congress had an opportunity to thoughtfully examine the impacts of the Supreme Court decision in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, striking down the traditional legislative veto on constitutional grounds. But, Mr. Speaker, we believe that the time may be ripe in this Congress to begin to examine concrete proposals for reform.

THE 98TH CONGRESS RULES COMMITTEE ACTION

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not open these remarks by paying tribute to the energy and enthusiasm with which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], took up the extraordinary challenge, over the last 2 years, of assessing the impact of the High Court's decision.

The gentleman chaired an important series of hearings to weigh the institutional impact of the Chadha decision. Those hearings helped to bring into sharp focus both the similarities and differences in Members' opinions with respect to the legislative veto and alternatives for improved congressional oversight of the Federal regulatory establishment.

These hearings responded to a request by the leadership of a number of committees, most concerned by the Court decision, that the Committee on Rules, and particularly the committee's able chairman, provide active leadership in reviewing Chadha and beginning the task of formulating a general response The gentleman from Florida responded to this challenge with a keen personal interest. All of us on the committee have benefited, in this painstaking review, from the caution, judgment and experience that the gentleman has brought to bear on this subject.

DEVELOPMENT ON CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW LEGISLATION

Mr. Speaker, the legislative veto, for most purposes, has been a creature of the past decade. Its wide use and its death largely occurred in the period from 1974 to 1983.

The first clearly documented use of the technique by which Congress delegates a function of legislative character to the executive, subject to congressional nullification, is found in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act for fiscal year 1933, An amendment to that bill, sought by President Hoover, authorized the President to implement certain reorganizations in the executive branch, to become effective, after a statutory delay, unless disapproved by resolution of either House. That reorganization authority has been renewed or reinstated numerous times since. I also should note that our able colleague from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] has called the attention of our committee to precedents of immediate post-Revolutionary Congresses which imply much earlier use of the device.

Regardless of the origins of the legislative veto, its use beyond reorganization statutes clearly had been infrequent until 1974. That was the year of enactment of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, which established procedures for congressional review of Presidential impoundments of previously appropriated funds.

That title of the act served as the model for legislative vetoes subsequently applied to a wide variety of rulemaking and other executive actions. These mechanisms, carried in law, numbered in the hundreds by the time that the Supreme Court ruled in Chadha, and two related matters, in sweeping language, which is generally understood to have invalidated almost any traditional use of the legislative veto.

PROPOSALS FOR GENERAL SYSTEMS OF REGULATORY REVIEW

Mr. Speaker, beginning in 1975, proposals were introduced to establish a generic one-House veto, applicable to the regulations of all Federal agencies. Over the years, variations on this proposal began to appear, requiring either the affirmative or passive concurrence of the other House for a veto resolution to overturn a regulation.

These proposals gained significant support over the years. Starting in 1979, regulatory reform also became a significant issue, pressed by both the Carter and Reagan administrations. In Congress, the legislative veto became tightly wedded to the issue of regulatory reform. Because of this, it became necessary for agreements to be reached on both controversial issues for any legislative action to occur. The result, regrettably, has been total inaction.

In the 96th and 97th Congresses, there was a significant level of action on both issues, but no final resolution of these matters was possible. The Supreme Court ruling, in Chadha and related matters, introduced a new complexity which prevented any significant legislative action in the 98th Congress.

However, I think Congress has done a commendable job, in responding to the court ruling with thorough and cautious reviews to weigh the impact of the decision. I have previously noted the hearings by the Committee on Rules. The Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on the Judiciary also held useful hearings on the broad issue. A number of other committees reviewed the specific vetoes, touched by Chadha, within their jurisdictions. Notable among these were the full committee hearings by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to weigh foreign policy review statutes, and those in the Committee on Government Operations, which produced two pieces of legislation, ultimately enacted, to resolve all the implications of the Chadha decision, as they apply to the Reorganization Act.

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, the committees of the other body have been active, and reviews by the appropriate subcommittees of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Governmental Affairs have been thorough and have made important contributions to an intelligent assessment of Chadha.

I believe these reviews have contributed to a clearer perception of the impact of the Supreme Court decision and will serve as an appropriate basis in this Congress to begin formulating comprehensive reforms in congressional review of agency rules and other executive actions.

DEVELOPMENT OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 2

Mr. Speaker, at the time that a generic legislative veto was first proposed, in the 94th Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary presented the proposal for a House vote. The bill had strong support but failed to obtain the two-thirds necessary under a motion to suspend the rules. Over the years since, controversy over the proposal has grown, and the proposal has never again reached a House vote, although a generic legislative veto did pass the Senate in 1982, as part of a major regulatory reform bill (S. 1080, 97th Congress).

During the 94th Congress, the full Committee on Rules held hearings on the legislative veto and the Subcommittee on Rules and Organization of the House, chaired by the able gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], held more thorough hearings in the 95th Congress.

At the beginning of the 96th Congress, the Committee on Rules established two standing subcommittees. The panel I have chaired, the Subcommittee on Rules of the House, was specifically charged by the committee with responsibility for a comprehensive study of congressional review proposals, in the context of regulatory reform. These hearings were conducted throughout the 96th and 97th Congresses.

The subcommittee reviewed a number of proposals pending before it. One, which was not pending before the subcommittee, struck my particular personal interest. In 1978, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KINDNESS] had submitted legislation (H.R. 14222, 95th Congress), similar to other bills to establish a one-House legislative veto. But that legislation had proposed the establishment of a joint committee to carry out the reviews.

During the course of our subcommittee investigations, the sound judgement of the gentleman from Ohio was continually underscored. On the not remarkable notion that there was no need to reinvent the wheel, our subcommittee undertook a very careful study of what other legislatures had done in establishing systems for legislative review of agency rules. I continue to think it is very instructive to note that the overwhelming majority of State legislatures and virtually all national legislatures, which have formal review systems, have chartered specific committees to carry out those reviews. This has commonly been the case even in legislatures which had attempted ad hoc systems. Notable was that the British House of Commons, which has the oldest review system and the scope of national regulation which comes closest of any legislative body to the scale of matters that would be presented to the U.S. Congress.

The judgment of the gentleman from Ohio was further underscored by the fact that, in the majority of cases in which committees had been established, joint committees had been used. This was even true, commonly, in legislatures whose standing committee structure is bicameral.

In 1981, I submitted legislation (H.R. 1, 97th Congress) to provide a systematic approach to congressional review of agency rules, through a select committee of the House. The select committee would have been authorized to report joint resolutions, the enactment of which would overturn a regulation, on specified grounds. In view of the unwillingness of the other body, at that time, to consider a joint committee, the select committee seemed to offer a reasonable position.

During the following 6 years, however, I elected not to attempt to move this proposition. During the 96th and 97th Congress, although I had become convinced that the traditional legislative veto was unconstitutional, it continued to enjoy broad, bipartisan support in the House. Likewise, any proposal to establish a select committee tended to raise obvious concerns.

Nevertheless, I have accepted the widespread experience of other legislatures and continue to believe that a formal system and structure for review of Federal agency regulations is needed. The Congressional Regulatory Oversight Improvements Resolution of 1985 attempts to address that need.

Mr. Speaker, two specific aspects of the resolution are the heart of the proposal. And, since it is these aspects which will generate the most controversy, I should address them in some detail at this point.

CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

Mr. Speaker, the central component of the resolution is the establishment of a Joint Committee on Regulatory Affairs, which would have authority to review all Federal agency rules. The joint committee would report to each House on those it viewed appropriate to call to the attention of Congress.

I have maintained for many years that the root causes of many of our problems in the regulatory arena lie on Capitol Hill. Perhaps, if one shares this viewpoint, in an unexpected way, the Supreme Court has done Congress an enormous favor in Chadha. Up until now, the legislative veto has allowed Congress to focus our complaints and concerns on unelected bureaucrats and made it very easy to avoid a long, hard look at deficiencies of our own institution.

I do not disparage the need for regulatory reform legislation, in noting that genuine reform of the procedure by which Congress oversees Federal regulation is an equal priority.

For a variety of reasons, Congress often finds itself unable to legislate with precision. In many cases this is unavoidable, as in the case of regulation of a highly technical nature or over situations that are subject to rapid change or emergency. But, in many more cases, the requirement is imposed only by convenience. Major factors include the May 15 deadline imposed by the Congressional Budget Act for authorization bills, the increase in multiple referred measures, the proliferation of subcommittees and caucuses, and decreased resistance to revising bills in committee markup sessions and in Committees of the Whole.

All these factors have made it difficult to write legislation with real clarity, and the political context often makes it tempting to resort to vagarity to compromise, or simply to obscure, policy differences.

And so, too frequently, Congress has attacked unelected bureaucrats for writing regulations which are vague or confusing or which do not reflect legislative intent. And seldom do people step forward to point out that poorly written laws can only be implemented with poorly written regulations.

Equal outrage has been expressed in Congress over conflict, duplication and overlap between regulations. But a detailed examination would indicate that, not coincidentally, most specific conflicts, duplications and overlaps very precisely mirror those in the congressional committee structure which this House established in 1946 and hasn't seriously modified since.

These are not problems that are unique to this body. State legislatures and other national legislatures face similar difficulties, often compounded by limited sessions. At the same time that the problem of legislative accountability for regulations confronted the Congress, other legislatures have acted. In the majority of cases they have determined that review of regulations is a function sufficiently large and sufficiently discrete from the legislative process to warrant chartering a committee for this function. Nevertheless, from our long experience advocating this position, the gentleman from Ohio and I are aware that this is the most controversial aspect of the resolution we are presenting.

Any proposal to establish a new committee presents significant political concern, and there is particular institutional resistance to joint committees. Nevertheless, the proposal is a reasonable one, and it provides an effective vehicle by which Congress can undertake the important work of making the regulatory process more accountable and efficient.

ENFORCEMENT

Mr. Speaker, our review of other legislatures offers high hope that the joint committee could make its most useful contribution by providing a forum for resolution of disputes raised in the regulatory process and as a quality assurance check in the development of new rules. If the joint committee were to function in the manner that I would hope, confrontations that brought regulations to congressional votes would be rare.

Nevertheless, experience has demonstrated that such a committee must have some enforcement mechanism, and that mechanism must actually work if it needs to be used.

The resolution (H. Con. Res. 2) proposes to use the appropriations process as a principal tool for enforcement. If Congress adopted a resolution of the two Houses objecting to a regulation, it would be a rule in each House that the respective Committees on Appropriations would be prohibited from reporting new appropriations to carry out the regulation.

This proposal is not without controversy. However, it should be noted that the proposal is neither disruptive nor radical. First, it is understood that committees act as agents for their respective Houses, and it is rather difficult to imagine that the Appropriations Committee of either House would propose to fund a rule, rejected on specific findings by Congress. Indeed, the intent of this requirement can be met by only minor refinement of a rather simple and straightforward rider that has been carried in appropriation bills for several years.

The provision for a rider would provide temporary relief while the joint committee, in cooperation with the appropriate standing committees of each House, explored more direct and preferred solutions. Two methods provided for under the Congressional Regulatory Oversight Improvements Resolution of 1985 are regulatory reconciliation and judicial review.

Regulatory reconciliation would permit the joint committee to report legislation to require agency revision of a regulation that had been disapproved. This provides a method to avoid one of the great deficiencies of the traditional legislative veto. It would enable Congress to deal legislatively with its specific objections to regulation, without being straitjacketed into "yes" or "no" response to complex or difficult issues.

Judicial enforcement is a route too seldom explored by Congress. I recognize that there are legitimate concerns about the weight that the courts have accorded to the judgments of Congress. However, the courts have constitutional authority to overturn, on constitutional grounds, a regulation which is beyond statutory authority or inconsistent with legislative intent. Likewise they have authority, under the Administrative Procedures Act, to address a rule that is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. If the Congress makes a formal judgment, by resolution, that a rule is objectionable on either ground, it seems reasonable that Congress should lay these issues before the judiciary.

SUMMARY AND EXPLANATION

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Chadha decision may offer Congress an extraordinary opportunity to separate the issues of regulatory reform and congressional review of agency rules and finally to find reasonable and responsible approaches to each of these vital issues.

But, the court decision does not appear to advance the cause of separating the general subject of legislative veto from the far narrower topic of congressional review of agency rules. The important hearings, chaired by our colleague from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], have provided a forum for identifying the vast impact of the Chadha ruling. Clearly the ruling requires Congress to undertake a vast change in the oversight of executive actions. Regulations are an important part of this issue, and I commend this resolution to the study of my colleagues as an approach that may meet many concerns. However, I must stress that tremendously difficult issues remain in nonregulatory areas of oversight, and warrant equal attention.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would propose to discuss the Congressional Regulatory Oversight Improvements Resolution of 1985 in some detail. For convenience I would explain the provisions of the resolution (H. Con. Res. 2) by section:

Short Title

Mr. Speaker, the first section states that the concurrent resolution may be cited as the "Congressional Regulatory Oversight Improvements Resolution of 1985."

Unlike other "regulatory reform" bills, the resolution is entirely concerned with improvements in the process of congressional oversight of the Federal regulatory process and individual agency rules.

Exercise of Rulemaking Power

Mr. Speaker, section 2 states that the provisions of the resolution are adopted as an exercise of the rulemaking power of Congress; that they supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules.

It is customary to include, in bills which operate as rules, a disclaimer noting the power of each House of Congress to make or change its rules. The provisions of section 1001 of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are the modern model and are largely followed in this section. The Committee on Rules has previous reported to the House that "the authority of each House to 'determine the rules of its proceedings' is constitutionally grounded and the power of each House to modify rules it chooses to enact in statutory form is unaffected by whether that statute carries such a disclaimer" (H. Rept. 97-809, part 2). However, the committee has found the use of the disclaimer to be customary and appropriate.

This resolution is in the form of a congressional rule, and the resolution does not require the President's signature to take full effect, within its terms; as a result, it is not expected that it would be enacted in law. The precedents of the 44th Congress, in which the last system of joint rules were abrogated, imply that the situation is corollary to statutory rules; nevertheless inclusion of the disclaimer in the resolution is considered prudent.

Applicability

Mr. Speaker, section 3(a) establishes that, for purposes of determining the applicability of the resolution, the term "agency rule" means the whole of any statement or guideline, of any Federal officer or agency, of general applicability, whether applied to the entire regulated community or a segment thereof, designated to implement, interpret, or describe law or policy—whether or not such statement or guideline is subject to the notice and hearing requirements of title 5, United States Code, or any other law—including any amendment, revision, or repeal of such statement or guideline.

The policy of Congress has been that major regulatory actions should occur within the context of the Administrative Procedures Act, and it is that type of rulemaking that it intended to be the perview of review under the resolution. Nevertheless, it seems appropriate to place agencies on notice that review under the resolution cannot be escaped by using other forms of agency action.

Computation of Session

Mr. Speaker, section 3(a) provides that continuity of session shall be broken only by an adjournment at the end of Congress, and that only days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment exceeding 15 days shall be excluded in computing days of continuous session.

Several references in the resolution require calculations of days of session and the method of computation needs be defined. The resolution attempts to impose as few delays as possible in order to assure prompt resolution of regulatory issues.

Relation to Other Laws

Mr. Speaker, section 3(c) provides that the resolution supersedes all other legislative veto laws, except those which provide for action by enactment of a bill or joint resolution.

The purpose of the resolution is to establish a uniform and coordinated procedure and structure for addressing regulatory concerns. The resolution therefor substitutes its procedures for those in existing law whose efficacy is in doubt.

Establishment of Joint Committee

Mr. Speaker, section 101 establishes a joint committee of the Congress to be known as the Joint Committee on Regulatory Affairs.

During studies on regulatory reform, in the 96th and 97th Congresses, the Subcommittee on Rules of the House established a hearing record that indicated that the overwhelming majority of State legislatures, and virtually all national legislatures, which have established formal regulatory review systems have chartered specific committee to conduct the reviews.

In connection with this proposal, two questions need to be examined. The first is the wisdom and propriety of setting up any committee for regulatory review and the second is the determination to use the format of a joint committee.

The proposal for a committee has several purposes.

The principal point is that it appears to offer the only possible method to bridge the concerns of two prominent philosophies that have stalemated the House on the specific issue of congressional review of regulations and, as a result, the broader question of regulatory reform. Authors of various legislative veto proposals have argued that a review cannot be effective within a system that essentially depends on a report from the committee which is part of the "iron triangle" which produced the rule. Opponents of such proposals, however, have argued that systems which allow matters to come before the House, other than by committee report or on demand of a majority, reverse a century of progress in establishing a legislative process that has any hope of handling the volume and complexity of concerns now facing Congress.

The establishment of a regulatory review committee allows effective congressional review of rules, within the tradition of committee consideration, but places the matter before a committee whose horizontal jurisdiction offers more independence than is possible within the legislative committees. For further discussion of these issues, see sections 202(b) and 301(c).

Although most congressional criticisms of the regulatory process have focused on ultra vires rules, public criticism has tended to focus more on rules which conflict with, or duplicate, each other or which prove either excessively vague or detailed for efficient implementation. It can reasonably be argued that these criticisms are misdirected and that these problems actually derive from underlying statutes, which largely mirror similar deficiences in the congressional committee structure. A committee authorized to review all rules on a commonsense basis would be free to bring a perspective to rules, or sets of related rules, that is impossible within the existing congressional or executive structure.

The establishment of a joint committee, in many respects, runs counter to the general trend of congressional committee structure. The nature of the proposed committee's functions must be weighed against the political philosophy that has created a strong congressional tradition of bicamerical committee consideration. It generally has been felt that the separate development of legislation by each House, and subsequent conference to compromise difference which have developed, produces a legislative product that is improved or, at least, more cautious. In the present case, however, the proposed committee's principal function is to report regulatory disapproval resolutions which make findings with respect to a rule which are required, at each stage of consideration, to be identical.

The one report of a legislative character which the committee is permitted to make is a joint resolution to reconcile a regulation to the findings of an adopted concurrent resolution. And, in that case, the resolution provides for the joint resolution to be considered sequentially by the respective standing committees of each House—see section 204.

Appointment

Mr. Speaker, section 102 provides that the joint committee shall be composed of 16 members, 8 from each House. The chairmanship and vice chairmanship would rotate in the customary manner, with a House chairman in each odd numbered Congress. Appointments to the joint committee would be in proportion to the respective party membership of each House, and would be made in consultation with the respective party leadership of each House. Vacancies in the membership of the joint committee would not affect the power of a quorum of the authorized membership of the joint committee to execute the functions of the joint committee and would be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

The determination of the size of a joint committee is arbitrary, but it is generally wise to fix a specific size. Joint and select committee appointments historically have been made casually, and have been used to accommodate Members frustrated in the regular committee bidding process. As an example, the Select Committee on Aging now has 60 members. Sixteen members would seem to be a group in which it would be possible for members to act collegially, and in which it might not be too difficult to make a quorum.

The requirement that the committee reflect the party ratios of each House is a new, but not particularly radical, proposal. To the extent that the experience of other legislatures is indicative, the joint committee will make its most useful contribution as a quality assurance check on the regulatory process, rather than as a regulatory policy tribunal. This is not a partisan function and is enhanced by appointment of a committee which reflects the Congress as a whole.

Provisions relating to equal membership, rotation of chairmanship, and vacancies are boilerplate for joint committees.

Investigations

Mr. Speaker, section 103 sets the general responsibilities of the joint committee and the basis of its relationship to the standing committees. It states that the joint committee shall have the responsibility of monitoring on a continuing basis the rulemaking activities of all Federal agencies. It specifies that the joint committee may undertake an investigation of any agency rule on its own initiative or at the request of any Member or group of Members of either House, and requires an investigation at the request of any standing committee of either House having substantial jurisdiction over the subject matter of such rule.

The committee may undertake an investigation of any currently effective rule or of any proposed new rule, at any stage of consideration, and may consolidate reviews of two or more related rules.

The resolution states that it shall not be construed to prevent or discourage any standing committee of either House from carrying out its legislative and oversight responsibilities with respect to the regulatory activities of Federal agencies within its jurisdiction, and requires the joint committee to keep the appropriate standing committees of each House continuously apprised of any study or investigation it undertakes.

The section attempts to establish a charter for the joint committee based on the real oversight needs of Congress with respect to the regulatory process. It also attempts to set a reasonable balance between the respective functions and responsibilities of the joint committee and the standing committees of each House.

Agency Cooperation

Mr. Speaker, section 104 states that the joint committee, at the time it initiates an investigation of an agency rule, is required to notify the head of the agency in question.

As authorized by the joint committee, such notice may include a request that the agency suspend or otherwise delay the implementation of a new proposed rule, which has not yet become effective, for a period of not to exceed 90 calendar days. The section states that it is the sense of Congress that any such request should be accommodated.

A provision which only urges Federal agencies to delay the implementation of proposed rules which are being investigated may be a weaker provision than would be desired. However, if the provision is found unsatisfactory in practice, a strong delaying mechanism can be enacted separately. The question does not seem so decisive as to warrant abandoning the convenience of using a concurrent resolution.

Concurrent Resolutions

Mr. Speaker, section 201 authorizes the joint committee to report identical concurrent resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the Senate disapproving an agency rule it has reviewed on any of the following grounds:

First. The agency has failed to provide the joint committee with adequate or timely information that it needed to carry out an investigation of the rule under the resolution;

Second. The rule is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable;

Third. The rule duplicates, overlaps, or conflicts with other Federal rules or statutes—or common State regulations or statutes—in such a way that compliance is unnecessarily costly or burdensome;

Fourth. The rule imposes a significant cost or burden which is not adequately offset by the public benefit;

Fifth. The rule has been issued in such a way as to make it unreasonable to expect the regulated community to be aware of the rule;

Sixth. The rule is written in such a way that the regulated community cannot reasonably be expected to understand the rule;

Seventh. The rule does not provide adequate guidance for compliance; or Eighth. The rule is beyond the statutory authority of the agency or inconsistent with the legislative intent of the applicable statute.

The section also provides for a number of technical matters relating to the time, form, and nature of joint committee reports.

The proposed reporting authority of the joint committee is broad and would seem to include any reasonable basis on which objection might be made to a rule. Although it seems necessary to establish the specific grounds on which the committee might report, the committee should enjoy broad bases on which to report to Congress on its reviews.

Senate Consideration of Concurrent Resolutions

Mr. Speaker, section 202(a) establishes the procedures for Senate consideration of a concurrent resolution. The section provides a highly expedited procedure, with 2 hours of debate, divided in the customary manner, and providing for a straight up-or-down vote on the resolution. It provides for a privileged motion to discharge the joint committee on petition of 20 Senators. It is similar to expedited procedures the Senate has generally adopted for similar matters.

If, prior to the adoption of the resolution of the Senate, an identical resolution is received from the House, the vote on adoption would occur on the resolution of the House.

The Senate has long recognized the need for expedited procedures to assure that a majority is able to act; under its standing rules the serious opposition of a single Member is decisive unless the matter enjoys strong leadership backing and the voting support of a super-majority of 60 Senators—66 in the case of rules. This has been accepted as particularly important in the case of measures intended to review exercises of authority granted under previously enacted delegations, and the Senate frequently inserts such provisions when it enacts legislation granting executive discretion to make policy determinations of a legislative character.

In the absence of such special rules, it would be possible for a policy determination, especially by an independent regulatory agency, which was opposed by a majority in each House and by the President, to be affirmed by the support of 31 Senators voting "no"—or even just absent—on cloture.

Although various political philosophies in the Senate may differ over specific applications of expedited procedures, a bipartisan consensus exists across the political spectrum about their necessity, and the adoption of expedited procedures in the Senate occasions little, if any, dispute.

The procedures proposed by the resolution are substantially similar to those proposed by the Senate in prior bills of a similar nature.

House Consideration of Concurrent Resolutions

Mr. Speaker, section 202(b) establishes the procedures for House consideration of a concurrent resolution. Concurrent resolutions would be considered on the second Thursday of each month or, if the House is not in session, on the next Thursday that the House is in session. Two hours of debate are provided, divided in the customary manner, and there would be a straight up-or-down vote on the resolution. Reports are subject to the usual 3-day layover. To accommodate an emergency situation, the joint committee could determine the order in which resolutions would be called up and the Speaker would be permitted to allow joint committee business to be brought up on any other day.

If, prior to the adoption of the resolution of one House, an identical resolution were received from the other, the vote on adoption would occur on the resolution of the other House.

The rules for floor consideration are designed to balance the need to obtain floor consideration with the other scheduling concerns of the House leadership. Although, as noted above, a Senate consensus existed on the subject, in the House, the need for, and the propriety of, expedited procedures has been subject to more contention.

Because of its larger size and somewhat more partisan history, the House has needed to establish special procedures to enable a majority to act even on regular legislation. Since 1883, this customarily has been effected by special orders, reported from the Committee on Rules, to establish a "rule" permitting any action—other than passage of a joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment, the question of passing a bill returned without the President's signature, or dispensing with Calendar Wednesday or a motion to recommit—to be accomplished by majority vote.

The Rules Committee tends to act in concert with the legislative committee and the leadership but, since the revisions of the discharge rule in 1935, an alternative method has existed which enables any majority to act and to set aside any rule of the House which would impede that action.

Opponents of expedited procedures have argued that the existing rules adequately protect the ability of a majority to effect action on legislation or regulations. They have also advanced the argument that a new special procedure, for a subsidiary class of legislation, creates potential for mischief that could disrupt more vital matters. Their argument enjoys persuasive support from the experience of the British Parliament with a similar ad hoc system that brought the government to the brink of paralysis in the early 1950's, and was finally resolved by the establishment of a review procedure based on reports on regulations from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

Advocates of strong congressional review of agency rules have argued that structural barriers to effective review exist in the House. Prior to the Supreme Court decision in INS v. Chadha, their argument was particularly persuasive in that most legislative delegations, subject to congressional review, had permitted rules to become effective as the functional equivalent of law, unless the legislative review was voted upon within a specified period of time.

In the wake of the Chadha decision, that timing issue is less compelling. Nevertheless, many of the structural concerns continue to exist. When an agency acts under statutory authority that is lacking or vague or, in the words of the British regulatory review statute, "makes an unexpected use" of an otherwise valid authority, it is to the committee that had opposed that statutory basis, by inadvertence or design, that congressional opponents of the rule first must turn.

The resolution attempts to bridge the differences between these groups in several ways. The proposal to establish a joint committee with a broad charter for review provides a method which draws on the strengths of the committee review process but still allows the review to occur outside the "iron triangle" within which the rule originated. The provisions of this subsection guarantee the committee's ability to obtain a vote by the House. By filtering the rules through a committee, most concerns about abuse are satisfied.

The fixing of a specific regular day for consideration of the committee's reports assures one faction that joint committee reports will be voted on and the other faction that regulatory review will not crowd out the normal processing of legislation by the House.

Appropriations Enforcement of Concurrent Resolution

Mr. Speaker, section 203 effectively requires that any appropriation for an agency must prohibit the use of those funds to carry out a rule, if Congress has adopted a concurrent resolution disapproving the rule.

It also protects that rider from points of order under other rules. And it protects the language from one procedural method by which conferees on the appropriation could circumvent the intent of the rider as submitted to the managers by the two Houses.

The section also establishes a procedure by which the Senate may waive the point of order; it is similar to the procedure used by the Senate for waiver of certain points of order under the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

Adequate waiver procedures exist in the House.

It has been the recent policy of Congress to include in appropriate bills a rider which prohibits use of funds to carry out a rule which has been disapproved under a statute which provides for a legislative veto. Although the riders required under this resolution are similar, this rule presents important differences.

Of course, the principal point is the vastly broader scope. Although various sources have noted the existence of "hundreds" of legislative vetoes, only a handful of these statutes apply to regulations. But, they apply only to those regulations promulgated under that statute and, at that, only to those issued after enactment. Even those regulations are usually only open for review during certain windows of opportunity, which seldom exceed 90 days. The joint committee on the other hand can report on a rule at any time. So the potential reach of riders under this resolution is the entire range of Federal regulation, currently effective and proposed, rather than the dozen or so a year that are potentially within the reach of the current riders.

The process proposed by the resolution meets the basic objective of legislative veto proponents, by providing Congress with an effective method to control a rule that is beyond statutory authority, by concurrent action of the two Houses. And, in the wake of the Chadha decision, it is probably the only method by which the two Houses can exercise that authority. The system is an exercise of the rulemaking power of Congress and, as such, is beyond review by any entity outside the Congress.

Regulatory Reconciliation

Mr. Speaker, section 204 authorizes a joint resolution to reconcile a rule to the findings Congress has made, in adopting a concurrent resolution relating to the rule. The joint resolution would be reported from the joint committee and sequentially referred to the appropriate standing committee for 60 days. After committee consideration, it would be subject to expedited procedures.

The joint resolution could require the agency in question to revise or repeal, or not to promulgate, the rule.

Once Congress, by concurrent action of the two Houses, has voiced objection to a rule, it is the obvious responsibility of the agency to respond to those concerns by revision or repeal of the rule, or suspension of a proposed rule. Failing that, it is equally the responsibility of the appropriate committees to act legislatively to remedy that situation.

This provision allows the joint committee, which has developed expertise through its review of the rule, to suggest such a remedy and to place it before the legislative committees in a manner which requires their action. But it does not limit the options available to the committee in reporting on the resolution. Nor does it limit the authority of the House to act on those reports.

The resolution contemplates a joint resolution which would require the agency to take the action specified. This is an attempt to accommodate concerns, voiced after Chadha, about the effect of joint resolutions of disapproval and, particularly, joint resolutions of approval. This concern would be even more serious in the case of resolutions to modify rules.

Nevertheless, this formulation is expected to be fully effective; it is highly doubtful, for example, that the courts would be inclined to give any support to a rule that had not been modified by the agency in compliance with a joint resolution that had been enacted into law.

Court Action

Mr. Speaker, section 205 authorizes the joint committee, acting on behalf of the Congress, to bring, or intervene in, a Federal court proceeding relating to an agency rule which had been disapproved by Congress on the basis that it is: First, arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable or second, beyond the statutory authority of the agency or inconsistent with the legislative intent of the applicable statute.

In general, Federal courts will review agency rules on the basis of statutory authority and legislative intent, under constitutional authority, and on the grounds that it is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable, under judicial authority derived from the Administrative Procedures Act.

Although the standards used to reach such judgements in Congress and in the courts are different, and Congress cannot bind the courts to make the same determination, it seems prudent to authorize recourse to the courts in a case in which the judgement of Congress is that a rule contravenes a standard on which the courts have power to set a rule aside.

Although critics of the Federal judiciary are skeptical about the level of deference the courts accord to the judgement of the Congress, in general, the Federal courts have broadly construed the standing of Congress to bring, and to intervene in, suits. Therefore, it is expected that a committee, acting on the basis of a joint rule and a specific finding by the Congress, would usually be successful in meeting the requirements of standing.

Committee Rules

Mr. Speaker, section 301(a) provides that the joint committee shall adopt rules of procedure which shall, to the maximum extent practicable, be consistent with the rules of each House applicable to its standing committees.

The rules of each House set a substantial number of requirements for committee action, intended to preserve the rights of political and ideological minorities in Congress; however, they are not totally consistent. The intent of this section is to require that the joint committee rules comply as fully as possible with the spirit of both sets of rules.

Quorum

Mr. Speaker, section 301(b) requires, for the purpose of establishing committee rules, making reports to both Houses, or certifying contempts to either House, the joint committee shall act on the basis of a majority vote of the members of the joint committee who are Members of each House, a majority of the members of the joint committee who are Members of each House being present. The joint committee, in its rules, may fix a lower quorum for other purposes.

The provision is intended to preserve the respective rights of each House by assuring that actions of the joint committee reflect the interests of a majority from each House.

Subcommittees

Mr. Speaker, section 301(c) permits the establishment of ad hoc subcommittees to carry out investigations or reviews of any specific agency rules. But the joint committee would be prohibited from establishing standing subcommittees.

Based on the experience of other legislatures, it is expected that one of the joint committee's most important contributions will be in reviewing conflict, duplication and overlap in regulations, which cannot be properly addressed within the existing committee structure. A prohibition on the establishment of standing subcommittees would prevent the joint committee from duplicating the compartmentalism of the standing committee and appropriation subcommittee structure.

Without such a prohibition, there would be some danger of adding another leg to the "iron triangle," defects of which are much of the reason for proposing a new regulatory review committee.

Authority

Mr. Speaker, section 302 authorizes the joint committees to sit and act during a Congress at such times and places, within the United States or elsewhere, whether either House is in session, has recessed or has adjourned, to hold such hearings at it deems necessary, and to send for persons and papers.

The provision is boilerplate to authorize committees to carry out investigations and to issue subpoenas.

Administration

Mr. Speaker, section 303 provides that, subject to appropriations, the joint committee can incur expenses, employ staff and consultants, and reimburse travel expenses of Members, staff, and certain witnesses, and it fixes pay ceilings for committee staff. The section provides that expenses will be paid equally from the contingent fund of each House but states the sense of Congress that, insofar as practicable, the joint committee should utilize the services of a consolidated, nonpartisan staff.

This provision is substantially boilerplate for the administrative authority of committees. As in the case of all joint committees, the committee would be funded in the annual appropriation bill for the legislative branch. The senior House and Senate Member would each be able to appoint one staff person to be directly responsible to that House and it is expected that the remainder of the staff would be appointed jointly on a nonpartisan basis.

Report on Regulatory and Oversight Improvements

Mr. Speaker, section 304 provides that, as soon as practicable in the 100th Congress, the joint committee would report to each House on its activities during the preceding Congress and make recommendations with respect to statutory changes and changes in the rules of each House necessary to improve the effectiveness of the functions of the joint committee and its responsiveness to the regulatory concerns of the Congress. The report would also include any recommendations for the enactment of such laws as the joint committee considers necessary and appropriate to improve the Federal regulatory process. The committees having jurisdiction over the subject matter of such report would conduct appropriate hearings during that Congress to review the report.

The establishment of the committee by a joint rule, adopted in the form of a concurrent resolution, has certain advantages. However, in the course of carrying out its responsibilities, the joint committee may encounter difficulties that cannot be addressed within the terms of a rule of Congress, relating to submission of agency rules, delay in the implementation of new rules, and other matters. This section is intended to allow the joint committee to recommend improvements in its charter, of a statutory character, based on its experience under this resolution.

Regulatory Library

Mr. Speaker, section 305 provides for a regulatory library to be established in the House, to be administered by the Postmaster.

During studies of regulatory reform, it has been noted that the information resources of Congress on administrative law are limited. It is therefore recommended that a congressional regulatory library be established. It is expected that a substantial number of other Members and committee staff would be clients of a such a facility. The only other library operated by the House makes available a substantial body of House publications. That library is operated by the Clerk, since he is responsible for the printing and custody of papers of the House. The proposed regulatory library would provide materials generally obtained from executive branch agencies. Since these would generally be made available to Congress through the Postmaster, he has been proposed as the officer to operate the library.

Effective Date

Mr. Speaker, section 306(a) provides for the resolution to be effective at the later of: First, the first day of the month which begins at least 60 days after the day on which the resolution is adopted by both Houses; or second, the beginning of the fiscal year which starts after May 15 on or before which the resolution is reported.

It is assumed that it would be desirable to implement the resolution promptly, but a brief delay is considered appropriate to afford the bipartisan leadership in each House some opportunity to weigh committee appointments. This section complies with the intent of section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 that all authorizations must be reported by May 15 preceding the fiscal year in which they become effective.

House Transition Provision

Mr. Speaker, section 306(b) provides that the Speaker would be authorized to appoint the members of the joint committee on the part of the House. When acting under this section, they would be subject to all requirements of rule XI, as they apply to committees of the House. They would carry out the responsibilities of the joint committee under the resolution, as they pertain to the House.

The effective date required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 could result in a delay between the adoption of the resolution and establishment of the joint committee of at least 4½ months or as much as 16½ months. This provision would enable the House to make use of any period preceding full implementation of the resolution to organize.

Amendment to Rules of the House

Mr. Speaker, section 306(c) amends rule XXIV of the Rules of the House of Representatives, relating to the order of business, by adding a new clause which restates the establishment of a special period for House consideration of joint committee reports under section 202(b) of the resolution, and provides for the continued applicability of the resolution to future Congresses.

Under the precedents, a concurrent resolution would expire with the Congress that passes it. Although the Senate is a continuing body, the House is not. In 1876, the last set of joint rules was abrogated, based on a finding by the Senate that the House had failed to readopt them for that Congress. A provision carried in the rules of the House would enable the House to readopt the rule at the organization of each Congress.●

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY] in introducing House Concurrent Resolution 2. He and I began examining the possibility of creating a joint congressional committee for the purpose of overseeing executive agency rulemaking activities some 6 years ago. The situation has changed a great deal since that time. For example, just 2 years ago, in Immigration and Naturalization Service versus Chadha, the Supreme Court dealt what many considered a fatal blow to the entire process of regulating the regulators by declaring the legislative veto unconstitutional, although that was not a rulemaking case.

By way of historical background, Mr. Speaker, the Congress attempt to reign in the unelected fourth branch of Government has developed considerably in the past decade. The continued and substantial cost of Federal regulation makes it a subject ripe for congressional attention. In a number of formal and informal exchanges with our colleagues on the subject of regulation, Mr. Speaker, I have found a growing number of the Members believe, and I think rightly so, that executive agencies have too often used the discretion granted them by statute to issue regulations which stray from or far exceed the intent of Congress. As a consequence, there has been an increasing interest in the past several Congresses to subject regulations to careful analysis. With regard to cost effectiveness, the administration has made strides by issuing Executive Order 12291. The resolution being put forth by my colleague and I today will compliment this by ensuring a thorough and thoughtful congressional review of all rulemaking activities.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I failed to note that one of the principal problems in this entire area, however, has been the marriage of legislative veto with regulatory reform efforts. As a result of this, neither proposal has been successful. Under the proposed resolution, the issues of legislative oversight of agency rulemaking and regulatory reform are clearly separated.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.] for the insight he provided in assessing the Chadha decision through the hearings held by the Administrative Law and Governmental Relations Subcommittee in the last Congress. I had the pleasure of serving with that gentleman on the Subcommittee on Administrative Law of the Judiciary Committee and believe that both the Judiciary and Rules Committee hearings have generated a careful examination of the issue. Indeed, a proper understanding now exists for the passage of House Concurrent Resolution 2.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is perhaps the only effective response to the Chadha decision, which essentially held that there is only one way to effect legislation and that is bicameral passage and presentment to the President. Therefore, any procedure devised by the Congress which uses bicameral passage and presentment to approve regulations is, in fact, not legislative veto but rather legislation. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that as such, it would be subject to the same rules of judicial review as any other congressional enactment.

As a consequence, the gentleman from Massachusetts and I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 2 as an alternative vehicle to the one-House legislative veto struck down in Chadha. In this resolution, we have focused on those powers which generally lie outside of the review of any court, specifically the right of each House of Congress to determine its own rules of procedure and the constitutional power of Congress—and particularly the House of Representatives—to control all governmental expenditures. As my colleague has noted, these are among the strongest powers Congress has at its disposal and they are vital instruments in crafting an effective regulatory oversight mechanism.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I believe this resolution is one of the most balanced proposals ever introduced in the area of congressional oversight of agency rulemaking. From the vantage points of the rules and Judiciary Committees, my colleague and I have had the benefit of a vast institutional examination of this issue. Indeed, I would like to compliment my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who have worked so diligently in fashioning a congressional response to the Chadha decision. We hope many of them will join with us in supporting House Concurrent Resolution 2.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to call to the attention of the Congress the fine job our colleague from Massachusetts has done in providing this body with the background necessary to properly consider the resolution. His statement accurately recalls the history of the issue in the 98th Congress, presents a cogent review of the development of congressional review legislation as well as the proposals for general systems of regulatory review. Similarly, he provides a brief background of the development of the present resolution and its specifics. I would once again, Mr. Speaker, like to thank the gentleman and state how much I look forward to working with him in the passage of this resolution.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD] be allowed to precede me in his special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

REINSTATE DEATH PENALTY FOR CRIMES OF ESPIONAGE AND TREASON

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this moment to thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] for allowing me to go ahead of him in his very special order.

Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to reinstate the death penalty for those convicted of crimes of espionage and treason against the United States.

The current maximum penalty of life in prison for these crimes is obviously not strong enough when individuals are willing to sell top U.S. security secrets for paltry sums and endanger the liberty and freedom of our citizens.

In fact, we have more people charged with espionage right now than ever before in our history. The number of persons charged with espionage in 1984 was nine times greater than only 5 years before.

Among those charged last year was a Northrop engineer in Los Angeles who allegedly tried to sell classified technical manuals, blueprints, drawings and a list of subcontractors involving Stealth technology to the Soviets for only $25,000. The money was apparently to be used to pay off debts which had prevented the engineer from obtaining top-level security clearance. The loss of that strategic Stealth technology to the Soviets would undoubtedly have caused irreparable damage to U.S. security.

Another case involved a naturalized U.S. citizen who had infiltrated U.S. intelligence and allegedly provided classified national security information to the intelligence service of his native Czechoslovakia. The individual had undergone training as an intelligence officer by Czech authorities for several years prior to immigrating to the United States.

Yet another case involved an employee of the United States Army, Intelligence and Security Command who allegedly sold classified information on a double agent operation to the Soviets for as little as $11,000.

National security in an open society like ours is always more vulnerable. We are ripe targets for picking by our enemies. But anyone who is thinking about doing irreparable harm to our national security by transferring defense information to the Soviets or others might reconsider if the death penalty hangs over them.

Tougher penalties for these crimes are widely supported by the public. A 1984 survey of my own constituents in Arizona's Fourth Congressional District revealed that an overwhelming 85 percent of those responding favored the death penalty for crimes of treason and espionage.

I urge my colleagues to join me as a cosponsor of this important legislation. The text of the measure follows:

H.R. 704

A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to establish rational criteria for the imposition of the sentence of death in cases of espionage and treason, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 2381 AMENDMENT

SECTION 1. (a) Section 2381 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by inserting "(a) OFFENSE.—" before "Whoever".

(b) Section 2381 of such title is further amended by adding at the end the following:

"(b) HEARING REQUIRED.—A person shall be subjected to the penalty of death for an offense under this section only if a hearing is held in accordance with this section.

"(c) NOTICE BY THE GOVERNMENT.—Whenever the Government intends to seek the death penalty for an offense under this section, the attorney for the Government, a reasonable time before trial or acceptance by the court of a plea of guilty, shall sign and file with the court, and serve upon the defendant, a notice—

"(1) that the Government in the event of conviction will seek the sentence of death, and

"(2) setting forth the aggravating factor or factors which the Government will seek to prove as the basis for the death penalty.

The court may permit the attorney for the Government to amend this notice for good cause shown.

"(d) HEARING BEFORE COURT OR JURY.—When the attorney for the Government has filed a notice as required under subsection (c) and the defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to the offense, the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered, or any other judge if the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered is unavailable, shall conduct a separate sentencing hearing to determine the punishment to be imposed. The hearing shall be conducted—

"(1) before the jury which determined the defendant's guilt;

"(2) before a jury impaneled for the purpose of the hearing if—

"(A) the defendant was convicted upon a plea of guilty;

"(B) the defendant was convicted after a trial before the court sitting without a jury;

"(C) the jury which determined the defendant's guilt has been discharged for good cause; or

"(D) after initial imposition of a sentence under this section, redetermination of the sentence under this section is necessary; or

"(3) before the court alone, upon the motion of the defendant and with the approval of the Government.

A jury impaneled pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection shall consist of twelve members, unless, at any time before the conclusion of the hearing, the parties stipulate with the approval of the court that it shall consist of any number less than twelve.

"(e) PROOF OF AGGRAVATING AND MITIGATING FACTORS.—Notwithstanding rule 32(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or any other provision of law, when a defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense under this section, no presentence report shall be prepared. In the sentencing hearing, information may be presented as to any matter relevant to the sentence and shall include matters relating to any of the aggravating or mitigating factors set forth in subsections (h) and (i), or any other mitigating factor. Where information is presented relating to any of the aggravating factors set forth in subsection (i), information may be presented relating to any other aggravating factor. Information presented may include the trial transcript and exhibits if the hearing is held before a jury or judge not present during the trial. Any other information relevant to such mitigating or aggravating factors may be presented by either the Government or the defendant, regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials, except that information may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury. The Government and the defendant shall be permitted to rebut any information received at the hearing and shall be given fair opportunity to present argument as the adequacy of the information to establish the existence of any of the aggravating or mitigating factors, and as to appropriateness in that case of imposing a sentence of death. The Government shall open the argument. The defendant shall be permitted to reply. The Government shall then be permitted to reply in rebuttal. The burden of establishing the existence of any aggravating factor is on the Government, and is not satisfied unless established beyond a reasonable doubt. The burden of establishing the existence of any mitigating factor is on the defendant, and is not satisfied unless established by a preponderance of the information.

"(f) RETURN OF FINDINGS.—The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider all the information received during the hearing. It shall return special findings identifying any mitigating factors, and any aggravating factors set forth in subsection (i), found to exist. If one of the aggravating factors set forth in subsection (i) is found to exist, a special finding identifying any other aggravating factor may be returned. A finding of such a factor by a jury shall be made by unanimous vote. If no aggravating factor set forth in subsection (i) is found to exist, the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law. If one or more of the aggravating factors set forth in subsection (i) is found to exist, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall then consider whether the aggravating factor or factors found to exist sufficiently outweigh any mitigating factor or factors found to exist, or in the absence of mitigating factors, whether the aggravating factors are themselves sufficient to justify a sentence of death. Based upon this consideration, the jury by unanimous vote, or if there is no jury, the court, shall return a finding as to whether a sentence of death is justified.

"(g) IMPOSITION OF SENTENCE.—Upon a finding under this section that a sentence of death is justified, the court shall sentence the defendant to death. Otherwise the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law.

"(h) MITIGATING FACTORS.—In determining whether a sentence of death is to be imposed on a defendant under this section, the following mitigating factors shall be considered but are not exclusive:

"(1) The defendant was less than eighteen years of age at the time of the crime.

"(2) The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(3) The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as constitutes a defense to the charge.

"(4) The defendant is punishable as a principal (as defined in section 2(a) of this title) in the offense, which was committed by another, but his participation was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(i) AGGRAVATING FACTORS.—If the defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense under this section, the following aggravating factors shall be considered but are not exclusive;

"(1) The defendant has been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which either a sentence of life imprisonment or death was authorized by law.

"(2) In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of substantial danger to the national security.

"(3) In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person.

"(j) INSTRUCTION TO JURY ON RIGHT OF THE DEFENDANT TO JUSTICE WITHOUT DISCRIMINATION.—In any hearing held before a jury under this section, the court shall instruct the jury that in its consideration of whether the sentence of death is justified it shall not consider the race, color, national origin, creed, or sex of the defendant. The jury shall return to the court a certificate signed by each juror that consideration of race, color, national origin, creed, or sex of the defendant was not involved in reaching his or her individual decision.

"(k) SENTENCING IN CAPITAL CASES IN WHICH DEATH PENALTY IS NOT SOUGHT OR IMPOSED.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, upon conviction of a person for an offense under this section, the court may impose a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole.

"(l) PREGNANT WOMEN.—In no event shall a sentence of death be carried out upon a pregnant woman.

"(m) APPEAL FROM SENTENCE OF DEATH.—(1) In any case in which the sentence of death is imposed under this section, the sentence of death shall be subject to review by the court of appeals upon appeal by the defendant. Notice of appeal must be filed within the time prescribed for appeal of judgment in section 2107 of title 28. An appeal under this subsection may be consolidated with an appeal of the judgment of conviction. Such review shall have priority over all other cases.

"(2) On review of the sentence, the court of appeals shall consider the record, the evidence submitted during the trial, the information submitted during the sentencing hearing, the procedures employed in the sentencing hearing, and the special findings returned under subsection (f).

"(3) The court shall affirm the sentence if it determines that—

"(A) the sentence of death was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor; and

"(B) the information supports the special finding of the existence of any aggravating factor, or the failure to find any mitigating factors as set forth or allowed in this section.

"(4) In all other cases the court shall remand the case for reconsideration under subsections (b) through (l) of this section.

"(5) The court of appeals shall state in writing the reasons for its disposition of the review of the sentence.".

SECTION 794 AMENDMENT

SEC. 2. Section 794(a) of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by striking out the period at the end of the section and inserting in lieu thereof ", except that the sentence of death shall not be imposed unless the jury or, if there is no jury, the court, further finds that the offense directly concerned nuclear weaponry, military spacecraft or satellites, early warning systems, or other means of defense or retaliation against large-scale attack; war plans; communications intelligence or cryptographic information; or any other major weapons system or major element of defense strategy. Subsections (b) through (m) of section 2381 of this title shall apply with respect to a sentence of death sought, imposed, or carried out for an offense under this subsection in the same manner and to the same extent such subsections (b) through (m) apply with respect to such a sentence for an offense under section 2381 of this title.".

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION PROCEDURE AND JUDICIAL REVIEW ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, on January 21, 1985, I introduced the Veterans' Administration Adjudication Procedure and Judicial Review Act. This act will restore important rights to the veterans of America and I look forward to its enactment in the 99th Congress.

American veterans fought for this country and sacrificed a very important part of their lives to protect the rights and freedoms enjoyed by other American citizens. Yet, veterans are denied important rights of citizenry—the right to judicial review and the right to be represented by counsel.

The preclusion of judicial review for decisions involving veterans benefits was first enacted in 1933 and reflected the then-current view that veterans had no right to benefits and thus did not warrant the protection that judicial review afforded.

In 1924, a $10 attorney fee limitation was set to protect pensioners from unethical lawyers; in reality, this limitation denies veterans the rights to counsel of their choice.

Both of these limitations are clearly anachronisms in today's society and are not in the best interest of today's veterans.

Nevertheless, under current law, a veteran's claim for benefits is decided upon completely with the closed system of the Veterans' Administration and may not be brought before the courts for adjudication should the veteran feel aggrieved.

Thus, veterans, who fought to protect the constitutional rights of every American, are denied by law the basic right to due process in their dealings with the Veterans' Administration.

The right to judicial review is available for virtually every other Federal benefit except those involving the VA and that simply is not right. I strongly believe that veterans should not be treated in this way, as second-class citizens. Particularly in the eyes of the law, veterans should not be discriminated against in their pursuit of justice.

The bill I have introduced will give veterans access to the judicial system if, upon final decision by the Board of Veterans Appeals, a veteran feels aggrieved and wants court review of that decision. It would also provide for reasonable attorney fees so that, if the veteran chooses, legal services can be retained at an affordable fee.

By advocating the changes contained in this bill, I am not saying that the VA deliberately reaches unfair decisions or that the internal VA process should be changed. In fact, my bill codifies current VA procedures for benefit claims.

I am saying that the VA has a vast, complex machinery dealing with billions of dollars of benefit claims. Sometimes, just in the normal course of events, errors will be made. Sometimes, just in the normal course of the human condition, arbitrary or capricious decisions will be made.

The current VA system fails to provide outside checks against such action by the agency. If you are the one suffering the error, inadvertent or otherwise, you should have recourse to judicial review.

I believe, in fact, that judicial review would benefit everyone, including the VA whose processes would be opened to the light of appropriate judicial scrutiny.

Under this bill, the current $10 attorney fee limitation is not lifted for a particular case until the veteran has received an initial BVA decision. Even after it is lifted, the bill contains various checks to ensure against unreasonable lawyer fees being charged the veteran. Thus, the veteran is protected, without prejudicing representation after denial of a claim. This approach seems clearly preferable to the current law.

Federal courts have reviewed for decades the most complex issues imaginable and the most complex of agency decisions. Indeed, for decades, the courts have interpreted and applied VA rating guidelines to the military disability retirement system since veterans filing under that system already have the right to judicial review. Even opponents of judicial review for VA decisions admit that this has worked very well.

The military disability retirement system closely parallels that of the VA. Many of the cases under the two systems are of similar character. Since the record shows that judicial review works well for the one, there is no reason to believe that it would not work equally as well for the other.

The military disability retirement system's boards handle about 35,000 cases per year. Their denial rate is about the same as that of the Board of Veterans Appeals. The few hundred cases that go to the courts from the military system clearly do not overwhelm the courts. There is no reason to believe that cases from the VA system would do so, either.

The main point to remember, however, is that even if they did, it is up to the Congress to address that problem on an equitable basis. Singling out the veterans in the VA system is arbitrary, blatantly unfair, and not the answer to court problems.

Mr. Speaker, let me conclude by saying that this bill restores fundamental rights to America's veterans. Eighty-seven House Members joined me as original cosponsors of this legislation. I urge our colleagues to join with us to pass this bill into law. Then, the law will be inclusive of the rights of veterans and justly so.

THE SEATING OF RICHARD D. McINTYRE OF THE EIGHTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to talk about the very important question of why the people of the Eighth District of Indiana are being deprived, unjustly and improperly, of a voice in the U.S. House of Representatives.

□ 1140

This case is unique in American history. Never before has a majority, in this case the Democratic majority, sought to deprive a people of their district of the legitimately elected and certified Representative.

I cite from the Clerk of the House on the opening day of the session, January 3, 1985, when he said, and I quote:

> Certificates of election covering the 435 seats in the 99th Congress have been received by the Clerk of the House and the names of those persons whose credentials show that they were regularly elected as Representatives in accordance with the laws of their respective States and of the United States, will be called.

And I note that under Indiana on this page H1 of January 3, 1985, is listed the name of the gentleman from the Eighth District, Mr. McIntyre. And the Clerk of this House had in fact reported to the House and to the Nation that his credentials indicated from the secretary of state from his State that he had been elected and that he was certified as having won.

A great deal of misinformation was brought forth that day by the Democratic leadership in seeking to create a very dangerous precedent of depriving the people of a district of their legitimately elected and certified representation. The key points to note are that the election was over, the duly elected secretary of state of the State of Indiana had certified Mr. McIntyre as the winner, there was no question about the normal procedures and there was absolutely no precedent for barring the people of the Eighth District of Indiana from having a voice in this Congress.

In an act of sheer brute power the Democratic Party sought to deny the people of the Eighth District of Indiana of a seat. Since that time a recount has been underway. That recount is not yet technically completed, but the counting is over and there is no question that the position of Mr. McIntyre and the position of the Eighth District of Indiana has been strengthened. There are no grounds to believe that the election will in any way change. So we are faced today with two raw facts: First, that a very, very dangerous precedent is being attempted by which any majority could deny the people of a district of their due representation; and second, that there are no factual grounds for denying Mr. McIntyre and the people of the Eighth District of Indiana their due representation in this Congress.

And in that spirit I wish to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman would agree with me that we really do have a situation which appears that the Democratic majority in the House is going to continue to deny Mr. McIntyre his rightful seat in the Congress despite the fact that the recount has been completed.

In yesterday's Washington Post we had some quotes by Democratic leadership that are very, very disturbing in what they had to say. The chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee says flatly that the House is going to resist any effort to seat Mr. McIntyre. Beyond that he says, and this is rather interesting, he says and I quote:

Nothing has changed the fact that Frank McCloskey won on election day and an honest, complete and nonpartisan vote count would confirm that.

I mean that just does not have any basis in reality at all. No. 1, things have changed the fact that Frank McCloskey won on election day from their perception; we now have a recount which shows that Frank McCloskey did not win on election day. It has not been completely certified yet, but we have the count in hand.

He implies that the State of Indiana is not honest because he says, "An honest vote will confirm that." Well, you know, what is he saying, that there is no honest count in Indiana? That it seems to me is a horrible statement. A complete count? We have a complete count now. The recount has been completed.

A nonpartisan vote? It is my understanding that most of the counties that have done the recount are in fact Democratic counties rather than Republican counties. So certainly the recount at this point has been nonpartisan in its nature.

I just think that the statements we hear coming out of the Democratic leadership at this point are very disturbing because what it seems to confirm is that they do intend to have the House Administration Committee rather than the State of Indiana make the determination as to who the victor of that seat is. That of course is a committee which they intend to stack against us by almost a 2-to-1 margin, and we can assume that that is being done with a purpose.

So certainly our perception of the situation has to be that we do have a wielding of brute power here. We have the kind of arrogance that has too often characterized the leadership of this House. And I think that what we need to be doing is congratulating Mr. McIntyre the winner, making certain that he is brought to the Chamber as early as possible and sworn in. If he is the rightful possessor of that seat, the people of his district deserve to be represented by the man they elected.

And I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished senior member from our delegation, the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I thank my colleague for yielding.

The statement was made this morning that the Democratic leadership has been saying that Frank McCloskey was declared the winner on election night. This is not true. Frank McCloskey has never been declared the winner by any properly elected official in the State of Indiana, either countywide or statewide.

The media, in the early morning hours after the election on Wednesday morning, was declaring McIntyre the winner. But in the middle of the afternoon on Wednesday it had found a 200-vote error in Vandenburgh County, a Democratic county. At that time the media started declaring McCloskey the winner. But the secretary of state is prohibited by law in the State of Indiana from certifying anyone for 10 days just because of this reason.

And during that 10-day period it was found that in another county two precincts had been counted twice and when they were eliminated by court action, when they were eliminated from the county, McIntyre was declared the winner and received the certificate 10 days later, as he should have, and as you say he should have been seated. Frank McCloskey was never declared the winner by any properly elected official in the State of Indiana.

Mr. GINGRICH. I might ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] to answer several questions, as a very distinguished leader of this effort within the Indiana delegation.

I of course will yield at this point to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In other words, what the gentleman is saying is that this statement by Mr. COELHO, the Chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee, is just not true, it is an absolutely false statement that appeared in yesterday's Washington Post.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, it is very politically motivated. We can all see what is happening here: Confuse the issue, try to delay the action as long as you can, figuring out a way that they could steal the election. Really, you are exactly right, this has never happened since I have read back through history of this House, never happened before, and I do not think the American people appreciate it one bit.

And I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me make one final question of the gentleman from Indiana, if I might. It is very important for people to understand this back home.

As I understand it, the only reason there was ever any confusion at any point was that a Democratic-elected clerk in a particular county had double counted two precincts, counted them twice, is that right?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, yes. Gibson County, on the election night or in the early morning hours, certified, at least released the figures, of showing Frank McCloskey with x number of votes.

The McIntyre Campaign Committee recognized that this particular instance, that the McCloskey-McIntyre race received significantly more votes than either President, the Governor or other races. They went back and started putting figures together and realized that two precincts had been counted twice. They so notified the clerk of that county, who happens to be a Democrat. The clerk did acknowledge, it is my understanding, that the error had been made but refused to change the certification and did not change for more than a week until a Democratic judge in the same county directed the clerk to give the proper certification to the secretary of state, which the Democratic clerk did at that time, which did then give McIntyre the lead.

Mr. GINGRICH. If I might then summarize, and I hope the gentleman will correct me if I misunderstand this, a local Democrat clerk initially reported wrongly two precincts by counting them twice in favor of the Democratic candidate.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. They happened to be Democratic precincts that gave McCloskey, the Democrat, a significant increase.

Mr. GINGRICH. Right. When it was pointed out to him that in fact this was wrong, he refused to change it until directed by a court to do so.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. That is right. In court, when it did go to court, the clerk admitted the error, that the error was acknowledged. It was not an intentional error. No one has ever accused this county clerk of any wrongdoing. It was just late night, certification, you know, everybody is working with figures, but the clerk did refuse to do so until directed by the judge, by the court.

In Indiana each county conducts its own recount and it is under the control of the circuit court judge, unlike some other States where you have a statewide recount. But each county has its own recount. So the judge has the final say and does direct the recount or how it is conducted.

□ 1150

Mr. GINGRICH. So in effect, the national Democratic leadership in this House is deliberately avoiding the honest count, is misinforming its own Members and the national news media, and at the same time is smearing the good name of the State of Indiana by suggesting that Indianans cannot hold an honest election.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I cannot speak for the Democratic leadership of this House or would I even try, or do I want to, but in any event, yes; I cannot believe some of the things that have happened.

Yesterday morning's press release, according to the Washington Post, according to the Speaker and the chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee, were in error by fact. Now I do not know whether it was intentional or not; but there were gross mistakes made, particularly by the chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee.

But in any event, that election was held back in November. Now is the time for everybody to say, "OK, we lost the election, let us go ahead and seat the Member that has the certification. We tried and we failed." And that to deny anything different than that is a gross injustice.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding, and I wonder if I can impose on the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] one more time; he has been generous with his wisdom here.

The Speaker has been specifically citing a precedent for the refusal to seat McIntyre, which ironically is also from an Indiana race. Now, in my understanding of that, there is no precedent at all involved there, and I wonder if you could explain for the benefit of the Members here why exactly the Speaker keeps calling this 1961 Indiana race a precedent for not seating Mr. McIntyre?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Well, the precedence is this, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. Speaker, both happened in Indiana; both affected an election for a Member of Congress; but the facts are quite different: In 1960, in that election for the 1961 Congress, after election, Mr. Chambers, a Republican, was certified by the secretary of state as having won the election on election night.

Subsequent to that, under a recanvas, it was found that there were some tabulation errors. The Clerk of the House had a certificate for Mr. Chambers. Then a letter was sent by the secretary of state; not a new certificate; a letter was sent by the secretary to the Clerk of the House stating that there had been an error, and under a reconsideration, a recanvas, not a recount, a recanvas of those votes, a retabulation, that Mr. Roush, a Democrat, was the winner.

The House was uncertain at that time because they first had a certificate on one and a letter on the other. So the House properly said, we are confused, we do not know who to seat. In this instance, where we have only one certificate, there is no question about who the winner was after all the dust settled, after the election, in this case there is no comparison because there are no two certificates. There is no confusion in Indiana at this point. Indiana knows the House says under its constitutional responsibility to seat Members, it has a right; but under Powell against McCormack the Supreme Court said the House does not have a right to decide which Member should be seated.

Only under three conditions, and those are spelled out by the Constitution. The House is in error; it has violated the Constitution, it has violated case history and political precedent.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I will not take much time because I know we have a number of other Members here, Members who were elected with Mr. McIntyre and who were seated that want to speak on this issue.

I want to make the point: It is important to realize who is calling the shots on this issue within the Democratic caucus. The resolution to seat Mr. McIntyre has been referred to the House Administration Committee, and we keep talking about the House Administration Committee. It is not the House Administration Committee that is making the decisions on this issue, nor is it the House Rules Committee or any other duly constituted committee of this House. It is the Democratic National Campaign Committee that is making the decisions about whether or not Mr. McIntyre should be seated.

The evidence of that is that the chairman of that committee has been the primary spokesman on behalf of Mr. McCloskey, and his reasoning is specious at best and political at worst. And we should label this for what it is; it is simply a political power grab in violation, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] has just pointed out, of the Constitution as well as the rules of the House.

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. KOLBE. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning to join with my colleagues to urge this body to move swiftly to seat the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. McIntyre, as the representative of Indiana's Eighth District.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has been subjected to an ordeal for these last 10 weeks that none of us should wish to inflict on another.

However, in emerging from this ordeal, he can probably claim more truly the title of "winner" than any other Member of this body.

Mr. McIntyre won his election on November 7. He won it again when the counties in his district recanvassed their vote totals and forwarded the results to the secretary of state. He won it again when the secretary of state certified Mr. McIntyre as the winner of the race and so informed this House. And now, Mr. Speaker, at the end of a long and painstaking recount in which every ballot in every precinct in every county was reexamined and recounted he stands as the apparent winner. The certificate of the secretary of state stands.

Mr. Speaker, the time is long past for this body to give the Eighth District of Indiana the representation that it deserves. If there are any unresolved issues in this election there is ample time for the House Administration Committee and the State and Federal courts to examine them.

It is highly unlikely that any of this will change the outcome of the election. But in the meantime, the precedents of this body argue forcefully for giving every district the presumption of representation.

Mr. Speaker, I look at my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and I see among them Members who won their election by fewer votes than the outcome in the Eighth District of Indiana. But they were seated—as they should have been—because their States decided they had fairly won the election and issued a certificate to that effect.

Mr. McIntyre was the winner of his election. He was so certified by the secretary of state in Indiana. This body must give the benefit of the doubt to the State.

The voters of that district should not be disenfranchised for even 1 more day. I urge this body to act swiftly to seat the winner of that election, and I tip my hat to Mr. McIntyre for his perseverance and the dignified manner in which he has conducted himself through this ordeal.

Mr. GINGRICH. If I might, Mr. Speaker, let me reaffirm what the gentleman from Arizona has said, because he himself has been in close elections, not always on the winning side, and he knows the chaos that would occur in a democracy if every time an election was close, the losing side decided to cheat.

The fact is that the American way is to allow the winner to be seated to represent the 500,000 people of that district, not to try to steal the seat against the wishes of the people.

I will be delighted to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join in with the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE] in expressing admiration for the eventual Congressman from the Eighth District of Indiana, Rick McIntyre.

I simply have been amazed at Mr. McIntyre's attitude throughout this whole process, and I have been able to talk with him nearly every day; I did so this morning. As many of us newcomers—the other 32 on the Republican side of the aisle, at least—have gotten to know Mr. McIntyre and his lovely wife Meredith, we are aware that they have a brandnew baby.

It is incredible that Mr. McIntyre continues to hold faith in our democratic process; has throughout this whole ordeal, throughout the court processes, the House deliberations. With all of these groups literally holding Mr. McIntyre's fate in their hands, he still has maintained an attitude of confidence in our system.

It encourages me to see almost this blind faith on the part of Mr. McIntyre in our democratic process. He is a good family man. He does not like to spend time away from his family, and yet he is still having to do so, and the other 32, and all of the newcomers on both sides of the aisle realize what a great personal sacrifice it is to get elected to this body.

Therefore, we can see how frustrating it must be to Rick and Meredith to keep going through this. I just want to join with the gentleman from Arizona in expressing my disappointment in the inaction of this body to go ahead and seat the gentleman from Indiana; it is costing the citizens of the Eighth District representation; they need a Congressman now who is able to research the issues that he is going to have to be facing: the farm bill, the budget process; and they do not have a Congressman who is able to do that because they do not have any representation right now.

□ 1200

In some of the remarks—and I especially thank the gentleman from Indiana for clarifying some points, because really as newcomers to the House, I say to the gentleman from Indiana, it has been confusing to us. In fact, some of wondered who won close elections, "Why didn't I have to go before the House Administration Committee."

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOULTER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. It is confusing to some of us who are here. I might add that the gentleman has used the word Mr. McIntyre is aware of the democratic process and still has faith in it.

Congressman-elect McIntyre is very much aware of the democratic process, except he spells democratic with a capital "D."

Mr. BOULTER. But I would say this: It is not a Republican versus capital "D" Democrat problem. It is almost a capital "D" Democrat problem versus democracy.

However, I still think, and I think everyone would agree that there are plenty of Members on that side of the aisle who also want to see the democratic process work. Maybe it is true, as the gentleman from Georgia stated, maybe it is true that they have heard some factual inaccuracies or something from certain Members on that side of the aisle, but I believe that they want to see the democratic process work and I just look forward to the day when Congressman-elect McIntyre, with his family, can be sworn in on this floor as the rest of us were.

Mr. GINGRICH. I just want to say that I think the gentleman from Texas put his finger on what has to be for a brand new participant in congressional politics a very frustrating moment to suddenly discover that there are some political bosses who desire power so much that they would threaten the very fragile compact by which we all agree that once the election is over we are Americans first and we recognize the results of that election. I think that this has been, in that sense, a threatening experience to see a handful of bosses on the Democratic side of the aisle try to seize a seat that the people of Indiana have deliberately chosen to give to a new Member.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I thank my distinguished colleague from Georgia for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as a new Member of this body who in the primary in my Republican Party had to go through a recount which I ended up winning by 10 votes and then a court case where that recount was certified, I can understand the personal frustration and agony that both Mr. McIntyre and Mr. McCloskey have gone through the last several weeks.

I am delighted that the recount has been completed and that my good friend, Rick McIntyre, is apparently the winner by a margin of 415 votes.

I think we have before this body a number of pressing issues that need to be addressed in the very near future and we need to get all 435 Members certified and in office so that we can begin the work before us. I am looking forward that next week when Mr. McIntyre presents himself to be seated that my colleagues both on my side of the aisle and the Democratic side of the aisle will uphold the certificate of the secretary of Indiana and seat Mr. McIntyre because we have got pressing business and we need to get on with it.

I am delighted that Congressman-elect McIntyre will soon be among us.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to our distinguished colleague from North Carolina [Mr. COBEY].

Mr. COBEY. I want to thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly struck with the hypocrisy of this situation. As I have been out on the campaign trail like my fellow colleagues, I have heard the Democratic Party over and over again trumpet themselves as the party of fairness. I am struck by the fact that this is a totally unfair situation and a complete affront to our democratic process.

This past summer it was my pleasure to be in Dallas at the Republican Convention and to meet a wonderful decent, fine, human being who was running for the Eighth District of Indiana, a family man, a man who had a wife expecting. And we all know the tension and stress that something like that can bring. I think that we should look at and I would hope that our Democratic colleagues would consider the human cost involved here, the tremendous agony and stress. And, yes, financially, the expense that has been brought about by this unprecedented action. It is high time and we should not wait one minute to quickly seat this outstanding representative of the people of the Eighth District of Indiana.

Mr. GINGRICH. If the gentleman would respond for just a moment, it suddenly struck me listening to the gentleman talking, as earlier the gentleman from Arizona, we have several members of the freshmen class who themselves were defeated in close races in the past. It must strike you as peculiarly disturbing that you abided by the system, that you allowed the will of the people of your district to dominate, that you went back out and campaigned, and it never occurred to you to try to steal a seat that you had not yet won fairly.

I am curious if the gentleman could comment just for a second on what must be sort of a disbelief that the Democratic leadership is so thwarting the will of the people of Indiana.

Mr. COBEY. I certainly am disturbed. I had no idea that anything like this could happen in our country. As my colleagues have mentioned, just an unprecedented power grab. Our whole country is built on fairness and equity and decency and this violates all that. We cannot allow this, both Republicans and Democrats, to happen in our country because we will be setting such a tremendously dangerous precedent that it would be very, very difficult to reverse in the future.

Mr. GINGRICH. It is with particular interest that I yield to the next gentleman who in his own right as a former secretary of state, I think, has enlightened many Republicans on just how severe a power grab and how disquieting this whole process can be. I yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MONSON].

Mr. MONSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my appreciation to Congressman-elect Rick McIntyre from Indiana for his diligence and persistence for working within the system to allow the democratic process to fulfill its objectives of allowing for representation in Government.

As was mentioned by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, I have just left a position as the chief election officer of one of our 50 States. My State of Utah twice elected me Lieutenant Governor and in that capacity I had the opportunity of overseeing elections for that State. In that capacity I had the opportunity to associate with all of the other election officers from the other States in our country. That opportunity taught me several things. First of all, these people are all public officials just like each of the Members of this body.

They all take an oath of office to uphold the laws of their State and of this land. They all have concerns for the election process and primary among those concerns are the insurance that accuracy is maintained in the election process with a strong desire to increase the public involvement in the election process.

It is actions like we have seen here that raise questions in people's minds and help them to decide that they do not want to participate in the democratic process any longer.

Each of these officials takes great care before they issue an election certificate to make sure that they are certain of the outcome that they are certifying.

As we have heard today, once in a while a mistake can occur, but it happens very rarely because of the care that is taken. There is certainly no evidence that a mistake has occurred in this instance.

So I would hope that all Members of this body will begin to realize the grave injustice that has taken place, the unfairness that has occurred and will immediately rectify that situation and allow Mr. McIntyre his proper place in this House and those 500,000 citizens of Indiana the opportunity to be represented.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the very distinguished economist and professor from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a moment about the young people and tell a little about my own experience in my campaign. I believed what I learned as a young person about the democratic processes in the United States. I entered my race without any political connections, without any political background, but with a belief in what I was doing and an understanding that if I presented myself to the people they would go to the polls and they would express their will and when those votes were counted if I had more votes than the other fellow I would be declared the winner and be certified by the proper State authority.

When I received that certificate I gave it to my 15-year-old son who had worked with me all summer. He kept the faith.

Because he knew that if we worked hard, if we presented ourselves to the voters and if they approved of us and more of them voted for us than the other fellow, that we would get that certificate, and that was the outcome of the process. I was very proud to see him receive that certificate because he had earned it alongside me, along with many other young people.

Now, I know that in this Hall we often have young people in the galleries who study in their classrooms and come here to see the process and the outcome of that process where on the principle that will outlive each and every Member of this House of one man and one vote this democracy will prevail, and they come to see that and to watch that practice. I do not want them to see that, in the final analysis, despite the vote of the people, despite the certificate that the winner receives, that in the final analysis it is political connections and it is partisan numbers that might decide who will represent those people who went to vote, exercised their privilege and performed their duty by saying who they wanted to represent their will.

I believe that Mr. McIntyre worked hard for his race, he presented himself to the people in his district, they approved of him, they voted for him, he was certified, and the day should come when he presents that certificate to his son and says that represents the democratic process in action and it is honored. This is very important, not to me, not to Mr. McIntyre, but to the young people who will inherit the legacy we leave them. I hope and pray that this body will rally behind those democratic principles on which this Nation was born and do honor to those principles and do honor to our young people and seat Mr. McIntyre in the manner to which he is entitled.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am particularly interested in yielding to the next person because she lost two elections, as I did, and we had close races, and we know personally what it is like not just once, but twice, to be put in a situation where it would be very tempting to try to come to Washington and say, "Please overturn the will of the people, please ignore how they voted, please give me the seat because I would like it." Both of us agree with the distinguished gentleman from Texas that the system of self-government requires that we honor the people and not just the political bosses.

So it is with particular delight that I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY].

Mrs. BENTLEY. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding and for his comments.

Yes, indeed, there were two times that I lost, and particularly on the second time I was urged by some to demand a recount and to go after it, because they felt that I had won. But again I said no, the vote that is apparent there shall prevail and the certification from the secretary of state shall prevail. So therefore I did not challenge it.

And this time, when I was the victor, my opponent said that the margin was sufficient that he was not going to challenge it even early on, before I even claimed victory, he conceded that he had lost. And that is part of the system. That is the system that many of our forefathers came to this country for. My parents were immigrants, and they came here because of our democracy, they came here because of our fairness, and they came here because they felt that right shall prevail here.

I want to be able to carry that on, that belief, by saluting Rick McIntyre as a seated Member to this body in the immediate future.

The recount report from Indiana on Tuesday shows that Congressman Rick McIntyre's margin of victory has widened, and it should be only a matter of clearing up some technical points that McIntyre will be able to join the rest of the 1985 freshman class as a voting Member, and we will welcome him with open arms.

We feel very, very strongly that the 415-vote margin of Tuesday only confirms our belief that he should have been seated on January 3 when the difference was 34 votes, and thus the people of the Eighth District of Indiana would have been represented, would be represented on this floor by a voting Member, rather than having the taxpayers of the United States paying two salaries and also for the staff of a loser while those 500,000 citizens of Indiana are disenfranchised in this body. That is not fairness, Mr. Speaker.

Congressman McIntyre has weathered the legal recount of the State of Indiana as a gentleman and has, as we have all pointed out, multiplied his margin of victory during this period while again the counties in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana completed their responsibility.

I do congratulate him for his upward climb and also the people of his district for their support and loyalty, and I am certain that when he finally is able to perform all of the duties to which he has been elected as a legislator, his merit will become more evident every day and his margin of victory will multiply many times over for later terms of office. The matter should now be ended, and he should be seated with all of the other Members who won election. And until some new standard is applied, is adopted and applied to all of those who run for public office, Mr. McIntyre is the elected Representative of the Eighth District of Indiana. I think that I speak for a number of his peers in saying that we will defend his right to his place for him, for his constitutents, and for the safety of representative government.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentlewoman for her comments.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACK].

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

A couple of thoughts go through my mind on this day, the first of which is how proud I am of the new Members, the new freshman Republican Members of Congress, who are having, I guess, their first opportunity to speak to this body.

I had the opportunity to be with many of you during these past few weeks, as we went through the orientation program, and I thought back to my disappointment, frankly, that our numbers were not greater as a result of the November 6 election. But I remember the last night that you all got together and each of you had the opportunity to express your feelings about the election that you had won and excitement of being involved in this great process that we have in this country and the importance of what we are doing, and I left that meeting with the feeling that the quality certainly is going to make up for any concern I had about the quantity. I think we are seeing that being expressed here today.

The other feeling that I have is, listening to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY], that he really kind of reduced the debate that should be taking place here today down to its very central point, and that is that it is not really a debate or an argument between parties. What we are really talking about here is the message that is being sent to the American people, that once again what we have is the result of the greed of power that just cannot stop consuming any possible way of adding to its majority. Unfortunately, the message that has been given so far, at least as far as the press, the media, is concerned, is that it is strictly a squabble between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, when, in reality, it goes so much deeper than that, it goes down to the very roots, the very basis of our country, and that is the one man, one vote, the point that we make to so many people, that it is time for them to become involved in the political process.

One of the things that I said when I first decided to run for Congress was that I think that the responsibility that each of us has is to try to reach out and involve more people in the process. And then we see that those who are in control and those who are in power are not saying that. In fact, their actions are basically saying to people, "Don't get involved in the process because we are going to control it, we are going to decide who wins, who loses, who gets to play the game."

So I want to commend you for what you are doing today. I hope we can deliver a message to the American people through the media that this debate is much more than a political partisan battle, it in fact goes to the very roots of our democracy.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield briefly to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding.

I cannot resist making the observation that it is instructive for all of us as Republicans to have the gentleman from Florida speaking on this topic, because the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACK] was unopposed in the recent election. And the way things are going, that is the only way Republicans are going to get elected around here.

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding

Mr. Speaker, as we sit here this morning and this afternoon watching individuals for the first time addressing this body, I cannot help but think, since I was a little boy, dreaming about this moment, the first time being able to address this body as a Member of the House of Representatives, and I cannot help but think that there is something that goes far beyond the Democrats and the Republicans who sit here.

□ 1220

There is a term that goes in front of all of our names, and it is the "honorable." The "honorable." I watched here, on January 3, when the Speaker of this body asked all Members to stand and be sworn in, with the exception of Mr. McIntyre and one other individual whom the Republicans voted to seat. His family had to share that disappointment on that day of being here and not being able to see their loved one sworn into this body.

I taught, as Mr. ARMEY referred to, the Constitution, for 6 years in the public school system. I was taught and I taught by students to respect it. This is not a Democrat issue; this is not a Republican issue. It goes to the very heart of the U.S. Constitution. Constitution, that is what we are talking about here. We are snubbing the U.S. Constitution. Mr. McIntyre was certified; he should have been seated. That does no stop the recount. There have been recounts before. But he was certified by the secretary of state. His lead has now increased; he should be seated.

I ask this body, especially the people on the opposite side of the aisle, to consider fairness here. To consider respect for the Constitution of the United States of America. Think about it; America, the American people are watching what is going on here in this body. We owe it to the American people to respect the Constitution of the United States.

You were not elected, none of us were elected to abuse power. Does the other party have the power? You bet they have the power, we know they have the power. We know you can use it; but you are not supposed to abuse it. You were elected to uphold the Constitution.

I ask you when the motion comes again before this body next week, to uphold the Constitution and seat Mr. McIntyre from the Eighth District of Indiana.

I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the gentleman just one thing: The gentleman represents in New Hampshire one of the great States which has local town meetings with a deep sense of the right of individuals to be heard and to participate. How are your folks reacting to this idea that a man can win an election, as Mr. McIntyre has and the people of Indiana can make a choice as they have, and yet nothing works because people for power reasons take away the seat? How does that fit in with the tradition of New Hampshire.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. It does not fit in well, I can assure the gentleman. The situation being town meetings, the proud tradition of one man, one vote, local control. Here the people of Indiana have expressed an opinion.

I would point out to this body that an individual, there is no requirement in terms of the number of votes that you have to win by. It can be one vote; it can be a million votes. But, it is the number of votes, the greatest number of votes that should provide that that individual be seated.

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California, a member of the Judiciary Committee and an expert on the law in his own right.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There obviously are some ironies and tragedies involved in this whole process. One of the tragedies is the lack of public attention that has been focused on this question. I dare say that if this special order were about the question of us attempting to get a salary increase for Members of Congress, the galleries in which the press find themselves would be packed. Our phones would be ringing off the hook.

If, on the other hand, we were talking about the fact that an owner of a major baseball team who happened to own the stadium in which the World Series was played stole the last or seventh game of the World Series, we would be hearing about it. We are concerned in the Congress at present time about the NFL moving some of its teams from one city to another. That is such a severe crisis that legislation is now being entered into the Congress to deal with that problem.

Here we have a question about the basics of the Constitution, and literally no press attention is being given to it. It was written up on swearing in day as a partisan squabble, and the real question here is whether people are having their democratic rights trampled upon. Yet virtually no word is being heard about this question.

In 1960, a crucial Presidential election took place between Richard Nixon and John F. Kennedy. As chronicled in the book by Theodore White, there was very good evidence of large-scale vote fraud in three major States of the Union. This was brought to the attention of the defeated candidate, Mr. Nixon, by the Justice Department, the Attorney General, and the head of the FBI.

Despite the fact that there was that information, the Republican candidate at that time made the decision not to challenge that election, not because he necessarily believed it would not turn out that he in fact had won, but because he thought the crisis of confidence in the constitutional processes of the United States would come about and the institutions that flow from that Constitution would be shaken. He made the judgment, and in Theodore White's he said it was one of the finest moments in Presidential election history that he not challenge the election of John F. Kennedy.

Now we have in this situation the fact that someone was duly elected; someone was duly certified by a sovereign State of the Union, and that person is not being seated. Why? Because, as everyone has said, raw political power has overcome this body. It is a sad day for this body.

We have no Members of the other side here; we said that before in certain other occasions, and have been criticized for saying that, but I would hope that at some point in time they come and defend their position as to why they would deny the people of the Eighth District of Indiana the opportunity to have representation here.

As I mentioned to one of the Representatives of Indiana, I went to college at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, and at that time, as I recall, it was still a sovereign State. It was on a coequal status with the State that I represent, California. But evidently we have decided here that the certification process that certified the other elected officials from the State of Indiana, Democrat and Republican alike, does not count in this case. Why? Because the margin of victory was, on swearing in day, something on the order of 35 votes, now on the order of 400-plus votes.

You can go down the record and find that there are a number of other people that have been seated who won by as small a margin. I lost my first election by 2,866 votes out of over 200,000 cast. I got 49.3 percent of the vote. I did not challenge my Democratic incumbent who was reelected at that time. I thought the people had spoken; he was seated. If I wanted to be seated I would come back and I would try and defeat him which I did 2 years hence.

The point is that this ought to be of a concern to every Member that is seated because if they can do this to Rick McIntyre, they can do it to me, they can do it to you. Now that is important for us personally, but beyond that, it is extremely important to the people we represent. The people of the 42d District of California sent me here. What right would this House have to refuse to have me seated. If I am concerned about my constituents, I have an obligation under the Constitution to be concerned about the constituents of Rick McIntyre.

We represent our districts, yes, but we represent them in the U.S. House of Representatives. We are referred to as the gentleman or the gentlewoman from the State of California; the State of Maryland, but we sit in the United States House of Representatives. We have an obligation to all the people.

This is a tragedy that has affected this House. It can be overcome by a vote of the people of this House, but it only will be overcome, in the short run, by a vote of the people of this House. I hope that the people of the Nation will be watching when we have another opportunity to vote on this because if we do not change this every single seat in the House of Representatives is subject to being overturned, and the views of the people of every district in every State of the Union is subject to being overturned, and that compromises the principles contained in the Constitution.

I thank the gentleman from Georgia for having this special order. I am only sorry he did not put out a press release saying that this special order was about a pay raise for Members of Congress, because, as I say, then we would get far more press attention that evidently we are going to get today.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the seating of Mr. McIntyre of Indiana. The gentleman from Florida mentioned just a few minutes ago, Mr. MACK, that this body is going to send a message to the people of America, and indeed, he is right. But I should also like to remind this body that the people of America sent us a message, too, in November, and they sent this entire body a message. A message that we were to come to Washington to address the issues that are so serious today: The issues of the deficit, the issues of the new foreign policy, the issue of tax reform, the issue of a balanced budget amendment, and on and on and on. The national defense. Certainly to deprive the people of the Eighth District of Indiana a seat in this body and to delay the representation by that particular area of our great country by refusing to seat Representative McIntyre, consitutionally, in my opinion, is wrong, and that issue has been discussed here today.

□ 1230

Legally it is wrong not to seat him, but most of all it is wrong not to seat him because it is right to do so. I urge the Members of this body to use their good judgment, to use their rationale, to use their good intelligence, to use the legal ramifications that they have backing them up and to immediately seat Mr. McIntyre, where the people from the great State of Indiana, the Eighth Congressional District, can have a bona fide Representative sitting in this body, as they are so entitled to do.

Mr. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SLAUGHTER. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding a part of his time.

Mr. Speaker, the election in the Eighth District of Indiana, the electoral process of counting the vote in that election, have shown Mr. McIntyre to be the winner, and when a duly qualified official who has to certify the election of Members of Congress and other candidates in the election states that a certain candidate is the winner, he is the winner until that result has been changed by action in Indiana, by action of the authorities or the courts in Indiana.

We have no such change. We have had recounts and it seems apparent that Mr. McIntyre is still the winner, and we still have that certificate from the duly qualified official in Indiana.

What sort of precedent will be set here today or in this session of Congress if we do not seat Mr. McIntyre? What elections are to be questioned by the House? By winners of by less than 50 votes, those who have won by less than 1 percent of the vote or one-half of 1 percent of the vote? In some States, including my own, if the election is close enough there is an automatic right to a recount by the candidate who appears to have been defeated.

Is the House to judge the results of all of those elections, all of those recounts, all of those narrow elections? Mr. Speaker, I think it would be very unwise for the House to do so. If it set that precedent, it would be wrong, it would be cumbersome, it would be setting the House up as a judge in place of the people who have voted in the elections.

On the other hand, if the House picked and chose certain elections to review and decide who the winner is, that would be an abuse of power by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the constitutional provision providing that the House shall be the sole judge of the qualifications of its Members relates to how votes are counted and to the results of the elections, but I think it relates to the other qualifications of Members of Congress as specified in the Constitution.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I will make this very brief. I think that what we have heard here today reflects the thoughts and wishes of many of us, and in the words of the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Florida, Mr. MACK, I, too, have youngsters who participated in the campaign and feel that this is something that is a travesty on the things that they have been taught and what our country stands for.

Coming from a State which right now is going through some tremendous economic problems, we have had a bit of a problem with seeing the Government as our friend. I think this is going to underscore once again that the Government is something not to be trusted. It boils down, I believe, into one word, and that is the word "fairness" which our distinguished colleagues from the other side of the aisle used against all of us during the campaign process.

If I were a freshman member of the Democratic class, I think I would have a great deal of difficulty in resting well at night knowing that that first vote that I cast on this floor was one of total unfairness.

Mr. McIntyre satisfies the four things he has to do. He is of legal age, he has been a resident of his State, he is certified the winner, and he has the votes in his column. There is absolutely no reason for any of this discussion to be taking place other than a show of brute strength of power.

So I think it boils down to one word, and that is "fairness." I think if any of those who voted not to seat Mr. McIntyre would choose to use that term in the future, I think it is going to be very, very difficult for them to live with that. The thing that I feel proud of, those of us here can sleep well at night and we know where we are.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that we should cut all this folderol out and get on with the business, seat Mr. McIntyre, and let this body get on with what we would like to do here.

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the very distinguished gentleman from New York, who knows, possibly as anyone in this House, about the process of counting.

Mr. DIOGUARDI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, had a very close race in New York, and it was a long count, almost 2 weeks, so I can fully understand the trauma that the gentleman from Indiana is going through right now. It is outrageous to think that the process has gone this long.

The citizens of Indiana have spoken, the secretary of state has spoken, and yet we do not have seated with us the distinguished gentleman from Indiana.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa that the issue of fairness is the key word, fairness not just to Mr. McIntyre, although that is very important, but fairness to the State of Indiana, fairness to the people of Indiana, the citizens of the Eighth Congressional District, and yes, fairness to the great tradition of this Democratic body.

It is outrageous to think that someone can come here with a certificate from the secretary of state and not be seated. This body serves 50 States. We are not the master of those States.

I came here from New York thinking that the great issues of the day would have to be solved with a bipartisan attitude, the issues that we have heard of, and yet one of the very first votes that I participate in is one of rank partisanship. Should the Senate do likewise, where the Republicans have the majority? Should they fail to seat someone because they have the numbers in a similar situation? I think not. In fact, I voted to seat Representative STALLINGS under almost identical circumstances because I believe in his rights and the rights of the people of his State.

I had hoped that my first speech on the floor of this body would be one praising the democratic character of this great institution, the greatest legislative body in the world. Instead, I am confronted with a very disturbing display of partisanship that threatens to withhold representation from thousands of Americans.

Richard McIntyre should be seated as the Representative of the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana. He has been certified the winner of that election. The recount is over. He has extended his count tenfold. I, and the overwhelming majority of my Republican colleagues, voted to seat Representative STALLINGS under very similar circumstances, and it should be done now.

This act is virtually unprecedented, and I think we should not let it go any further. I hope to work with my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to address the great questions of the day in a bipartisan manner. Actions such as these will erode the will to work with the majority and govern this country with the effectiveness it deserves.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, let me close my particular part of this process by saying that Lord Acton warned us over a century ago that power tends to corrupt, and absolute power tends to corrupt absolutely.

For 30 years the same group, the Democrats, have been in charge in the House of Representatives. There is a very great danger that among some of the Democratic leaders power now has become an end in itself. Not satisfied with working the gerrymander of the country so that 49.6 percent of the vote becomes only 42 percent of the seats for Republicans, there is now a serious effort underway in this House, led not by a radical faction or a rump group, but led by leaders of the Democartic Party, to deny the people of Indiana their fair seat, to deny the process fairness, and, in effect, to steal a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives.

This is probably the most alarming single effort to establish precedent that we have seen in our lifetime, and I hope every Member of the House will look at it accordingly.

● Mr. GROTBERG. Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise in support of the seating of my colleague from Indiana, Mr. McIntyre. Mr. McIntyre is the legitimate and certified winner of the 1984 election in the Eighth District of Indiana. In the recount of ballots which has just been completed there, his margin of victory has been increased from 30 votes to nearly 500 votes. Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner of the election in mid-December by the Indiana secretary of state. It seems incomprehensible to me that the majority leadership of the House would refuse to seat him as the duly elected representative of the congressional district in question. Although the House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, there is no precedent for the House not seating a Member who has a valid and duly executed certificate of election. There will be election contests resulting from the last election which will be decided by the Committee on House Administration, but the Members, certified as winners in those elections, have been seated. McIntyre should be seated now so that he can begin to represent the people of the Eighth District of Indiana who are at this time disenfranchised in the House of Representatives. It is a tragedy not only for Mr. McIntyre and the residents of his district, but it is one of the most unfair and unjust actions of the Democratic leadership of the House not to seat him immediately.●

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

THE WORLD'S FORESTS ARE IN PERIL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the world's forests are in peril. The condition of the world's forests is not good. This situation imperils our forest industry, it imperils the atmosphere and the air we breathe, it imperils the world's water and watersheds, and it imperils the world's wildlife.

In my own Northwest, the States of Oregon and Washington, Idaho and California, our timber industry is in deep depression.

□ 1240

There are many reasons accounting for this, but the reason that stands out at this time, the reason that is causing mills in my congressional district in southwest Oregon to close, is the vastly increased importation of lumber from our friends to the north in Canada.

Canada and Canada's timber industry have been very beneficial to the United States in the decades past at times when our housing starts and economy are high. Canada has shipped us extra lumber, helping us meet the demand in this country. At times when the economy has fallen off and housing starts have fallen off, Canada's imports have also fallen off, and this has allowed us a flexibility. It has been beneficial for our housing industry and our timber industry.

But now one thing has occurred that has upset this balance, and that is the strong rise of the U.S. dollar against the Canadian dollar and against almost all other currencies in the world. The Canadian dollar now stands at 75 cents to the U.S. dollar, although it has been for most decades in the past at rough parity. This means that the Canadians can undersell us by 25 percent, and they are doing so.

At a hearing that I held as chairman of the subcommittee which has jurisdiction over forest management in Portland in December, John Stephens, the president of Roseburg Lumber Co., the largest independent lumber company in this country, whose mills and headquarters are in my congressional district in Roseburg, OR, said he could put random length 2 by 4's on the dock at Long Beach, CA, for $254 a thousand board feet while the Canadians could put it on the dock at almost $100 a thousand board feet less. He was selling his lumber at a loss at $213 a thousand, but the Canadians would reduce their price to below that and undersell him.

The upshot has been that Canada's share of the U.S. lumber market has increased sharply from an historical average of 25 percent of our market to what is estimated to be as high as 40 percent or, according to some data, around 34 percent of the American market.

The result has been, as I mentioned, mill closings in the Northwest and a deep hurt to the Southern area and other areas of the U.S. timber industry.

Just a few weeks ago International Paper closed a lumber mill in Gardiner, OR, laying off 500 people in a community which, together with Reedsport, numbers not less than 5,000 people. That is an area that has already been hurt badly by the depression of the timber industry.

Major lumber corporations such as Weyerhaeuser, International Paper, Champion International, and Boise Cascade have closed mills in the past year that have never been closed before, that have withstood the onslaught of previous recessions in the timber industry. They are now closing. People are being laid off, many of them permanently, and they have extreme difficulty in finding jobs. Their condition is that if they are a 50-year-old lumber worker who has been working in his community for 20 or 30 years and has his home there, he is now unable to sell that home and leave and find employment elsewhere. The real estate will not move. The situation is critical for both the workers and the industry.

I am introducing, together with a host of cosponsors, the primary cosponsor being the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. CRAIG], a bill to restrict Canadian lumber imports to their traditional market share. Now, that is not an imposition of any hardship. We are just simply saying to our friends in Canada, "You have helped us in the past, we appreciate that, and all we are asking now is to limit your imports to what is your traditional historical market share, around 25 percent of our market."

I believe this could be beneficial to both the United States and Canadian workers in the timber industry, and I would hope that at the very least we have negotiations between our Government and the Canadian Government for voluntary restrictions on Canadian imports, much as the Japanese and the United States agreed on voluntary import restrictions on Japanese automobiles.

The state of the world's forests continues to be imperiled as well by the mysterious disease that is threatening to kill the entire forests of Germany. The Black Forest, supposedly the best-managed forest in the world, is dying. Over half the Black Forest has now died. Experts testifying at a hearing I held in May of 1984 said that it probably had been dying for 20 years but they did not know it. Only in the last several years, when the trees actually turned brown and died, did they realize the tremendous peril and the deep nature of the condition causing the death of the German forests.

They are convinced that air pollution is the cause of this death. They do not know as yet the precise ways in which air pollultion is killing the trees, killing all species. They are working on this, they are investigating it. They do not know whether it is the sulfurs or the nitrogens from the coal and other industries or whether it is nitrogens and ozone from automobile pollution, or both, or how it kills the trees. They do not know whether it is the fog depositing elements on the needles and leaves or whether it is attacking the root system through changing the soil content. They are unsure.

Our own Appalachian forests have shown signs of the some critical disease. The red spruce have died in the high elevations in our Appalachian forests all the way from New England down to Georgia and Alabama, and we may be facing the same critical situation as well in this country.

□ 1250

I was able to get additional research funds in the last Interior appropriations bill to investigate the condition of the western forests, the forests in my area, the great Douglas fir forests of the Cascade Mountains to see if something of this nature might be occurring there.

Remember, the German forests were dying for 20 years before they realized they were. This may be occurring in this country. We should and must find out.

The third great forestry condition in the world on which much of our well-being depends is tropical forestry, that great belt of forestry that runs around the equator in South America, Africa, Indonesia, the Philippines, Malaysia, and parts of other areas in other countries of the world. This is the vastest forest of all and many scientists feel the most fragile. Even though it is lush with life. with thousands and thousands of varieties of species and animal and insect life, it could be in the greatest jeopardy of all.

Tropical forestry is most imperiled today from what is called slash and burn agriculture, where the peoples of the tropical countries are forced one way or another to feed themselves or to increase their incomes and they go into the forests, cut the trees down, burn them, clear the land, and plant their crops.

The tragedy of this is that when they do that they are lucky to get one or two crops out of the soil before it turns bad and then they move on the cut and burn further expanses of the tropical forests.

Our tropical forests are disappearing also because of vast clearings for cattle ranches to provide the hamburger for McDonald's and other fast foods and also, of course, by logging. Our own industry in the Northwest, many of the famous names there, have gone to such places as Indonesia, the Philippines, and South America, to open mills to log and harvest the tropical trees, some of which grow to great heights, although most of them are the so-called deciduous or hardwoods, such as mahogany and teak.

The forests, particularly in Indonesia, the Philippines, and Malaysia, are disappearing at extremely rapid rates because of logging. It is estimated that in some of these countries that timber may be gone by as early as 1990 and in most of them the forests will be gone by the year 2000.

Slash and burn agriculture, which most affects Africa and Latin America, is of great seriousness also in the depreciation of these tropical forests, with some countries' loss of the tropical forests running to as much as 4 percent a year. At a rate of 4 percent a year we all know that in a few scant decades the entire forest will be gone.

We do not even know the effect that this disappearance of the forests will have on our atmosphere. Many scientists now suspect that rainfall may decrease or be changed if the forests are harvested or lost through slash and burn agriculture. They suspect that the addition of carbon dioxide to our atmosphere would increase sharply, which could threaten the entire world, and in fact, carbon dioxide levels have gone up sharply in the last 100 years.

The vanishing tropical forests could also have terrible impact on our own forests in the Northwest and throughout North America. It can affect them through demand for trees that we cannot supply. Even today such countries as China, Japan, and the People's Republic of China are buying logs from the Northwest at an extremely rapid rate and we are becoming in effect a tree farm for China and Japan, sending them our raw logs, a policy that I think is misguided, is tragically wrong, is costing us jobs in the Northwest, where if the few precious trees we do have we should manufacture ourselves; but all the world's forests are wrapped together in terms of its effect on our timber industries and our forests, our air, our water, and our wildlife. The vast genetic pools of the tropical forests contain thousands of species, while in the temperate zone you might have a few tens or hundreds of various species of plants and animals, in the tropical forests you have thousands of species and if the tropical forests disappear the world's genetic pool will shrink dramatically, endangering life on this planet.

With this in mind, I hope as chairman of the Forest Management Subcommittee to try to bring to the Congress a better picture and understanding of the various forests of the world and to aid me in my fight for my own timber industry and workers in the Northwest. So I ventured in January to one of the great research institutes of the world, the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute located in the country of Panama. The STRI is a branch of the prestigious Smithsonian Institute here in Washington. The Smithsonian Research Institute is in Panama because of some farsighted people set up this research institute up at the time we built the Panama Canal and opened it in 1914 and it has been in operation now for over 60 years. Because our knowledge of tropical forests is so slim and yet the impact of tropical forests on the world and the ability of life to maintain itself on this Earth are so closely entwined, research into tropical forestry is of greatest importance.

□ 1300

The first person I visited at the Smithsonian was its Director, Dr. Ira Rubinoff. This outstanding man is one of the finest administrators that I have had the privilege of meeting, and is a good scientist as well. He runs the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute in a fashion that allows scientists to do pure research and to develop thoughts, data, and experiments that they believe could enhance the knowledge of tropical forestry, and also to develop practical research that will help preserve tropical forestry through many ways such as helping the peoples of the tropical countries feed themselves on foods that are native to their areas so that they do not feel as impelled to go ahead and slash and burn their forests.

Dr. Rubinoff, himself an excellent scientist in marine shore fisheries and sea snakes, strikes me as the ideal person to run such an institute, and I was most impressed by him.

His Deputy Director, only recently appointed to the Smithsonian, is Dr. James R. Karr. Although Dr. Karr has been studying and doing work with the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute for many, many years, he strikes me as a valuable addition to the administrative staff at Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute. He also continues to do research in the ecology of birds and the conservation of natural resources. In both his administrative capacity and in his research, Dr. Karr is making a valuable contribution to our understanding of the life within a tropical forest.

Another fine Panamanian scientist employed by Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute, is Dr. Gilberto Ocana. We met with him and listened to his ideas of how to develop agriculture for his own people, to help them feed themselves. I cannot think of a greater endeavor on this Earth than for each individual nation to help its own people develop the agriculture necessary to feed themselves.

With the burgeoning populations throughout the world, this is going to become increasingly difficult, and relying on outside sources of food can become very dangerous. I believe it is the first priority of a nation to develop the means to feed its people. Dr. Ocana is working in this area, and I commend him highly.

Another young man, a very capable scientist named David Roubik, has been working now for 6 years in Panama and before that in French Guinea on the African bee that has been imported by Brazil. They imported it to help develop a bee breed that would do a better job for them in producing honey. But we got the African bee. It is sometimes called the killer bee, and that bee now has burgeoned in population and is moving to the north areas of South America and Central America. It has now reached up to Panama and into Costa Rica and Honduras and Nicaragua. Dr. Roubik estimates that the African bee will have reached the Southern United States by 1989 where it could have serious effects both on the Southern bee industry as well as Southern agriculture, because, you see, it does not do as good a job of pollinating, or at least of grouping as our bees, and it could produce a real threat, aside from the fact that it has a very, very bad sting. And we have Dr. Roubik, an outstanding young scientist, to thank for the knowledge we will have of the African bee before it comes to the United States.

Another scientist, named Stephen P. Hubbell, has done a most remarkable thing. He has developed roughly a 140-acre area on an island in the middle of Gatun Lake, the artificial lake created when we built the Panama Canal. It is really the top of a big hill. The island is called Barro Colorado, and BCI is the center of research on tropical forestry by the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute. And there are many young, vigorous, wonderful scientists on BCI, and even younger research assistants who are helping them.

I was most impressed that they were living in conditions that were decent but old wooden barracks, houses, and laboratories. It was quite an operation on Barro Colorado, and Stephen Hubbell has tagged, measured, categorized, and put down into a computer each plant in that 140 acres.

There are 250,000 plants of a size higher than, I believe, 3 feet, which was the cutoff point that Dr. Hubbell has cataloged. Many of them, of course, are trees, and now scientists can come in to study them and their ecology. They have, in effect, a huge natural laboratory to do their research on tropical forestry in the Hubbell-Foster Research Area. The person working with Hubbell, Robin Foster, aided Hubbell in this endeavor. They are now reinventorying the area, which is an enourmous amount of work. I commend them for this.

We are going to learn a lot about tropical forestry from them.

One outstanding scientist, Alan P. Smith, is doing work on Barro Colorado on the effects of Sun flecks on lower canopy trees. As you know, on a walk in a tropical forest, you cannot see the Sun most of the time because of this huge canopy of trees overhead. The Sun just gets through in little flickers, and the plants that are shorter, the subcanopy, only get a flicker of light here and there. Dr. Smith is finding out effectively these plants deal with this fleck of light in their photosynthesis and other aspects of their ecology—something we need to know badly to understand tropical forestry.

Dr. Joe Wright, our host on Barro Colorado, is a wonderful young man who, with his wife, Claudia, a charming and wonderful young woman, are going to have a baby later this year. So other things grow in the tropics besides trees.

□ 1310

Dr. Wright, among his many other duties on BCI, is doing something that I thought we probably had done many, many years before and certainly it is one of the most important things we do today. He has an apparatus that is measuring the levels of carbon dioxide at the various levels in the forest. When I say levels, there is a tall tower going up well over 100 feet with five monitoring stations from the top, down to the middle, to the bottom, in order to determine how much carbon dioxide is absorbed by the trees at these various levels.

We need to know this because one of the great threats to our world's environment is the increase of carbon dioxide in our atmosphere.

David Hamill and Gene Schupp are working on projects having to do with seed distribution. That is the real thing in a tropical forest. Every single plant, every species, is fighting to get its seeds out so that it can regrow. And if we want to keep our tropical forests, and regrow them, we are simply going to have to know a lot more about how the various species of plants and trees in a tropical forest develop the various means and techniques they use to disperse their seeds, and how well the seed does once it gets planted.

By that, I mean, does the seed grow better when it is right around its mother tree? Or does it grow better further out? These are the kinds of questions that Hamill and Schupp are asking.

Dr. Peter Becker, another of the outstanding young scientists on BCI, is studying the plant physiology of tropical forests. Dr. Becker's research into the relationships between soil quality, moisture retention, and plant growth is an essential prerequisite to our understanding of the regeneration of tropical forests.

There were some very, very outstanding women scientists, Lynn Loveless, Monica Geber, Marina Wong, doing work on insects, wasps, and genetics, whose work is forming an extremely significant background for our further understanding of life in tropical forests.

I met a most fascinating man named Charles Handley whose research work is on bats.

There are a lot of bats in tropical forests. They live up in the palm trees and in other trees. They come out at night and are vegetarian bats, mainly. They eat figs and have a great deal to do with dispersing fig seeds and fig production.

One of the most enchanting times that I spent working with the scientists in the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute was with Dr. Nicholas Smythe, who studies the behavior and ecology of mammals.

One of his projects is with a rodent called the paca. Now the paca is not an ordinary rat or mouse; it is a rather large animal several feet in length, with a lovely brown fur. The peoples of the rural areas in the tropics consider it the best meat they can find in the entire tropics. It is valued highly.

So Dr. Smythe is seeing if he can develop a technique raising pacas, naturally, in a way that small rural farmers in tropical countries could use to keep pacas beside their farm area, without destroying the jungle, and raise them for meat.

A similar experiment is being conducted with iguanas by Dr. Dagmar Werner. She is a most remarkable woman, of great proficiency. Her experiments with iguanas are designed to help farmers develop techniques for raising iguanas in exactly the same way that Dr. Smythe is working on the paca because the iguana is also highly valued for its meat. She is attempting to develop a way of keeping and raising iguanas in a rural farm setting so that they can produce the meat, the food that the people of the tropical nations desperately need.

Protein consumption, as you can imagine, among the people of tropical countries is very small. Their diet is mainly rice and beans, with very little protein, very little meat.

So Dr. Werner has an enormous number of experiments, such as the kinds of feed for iguanas, and whether they get along better with their own age group or with older or younger iguanas. She has literally hundreds of experiments going on simultaneously to determine the best way of raising iguanas. I was most impressed.

At the marine laboratory of the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute, we met Jeremy Jackson, who is studying the ecology of reef-dwelling invertebrates, and Nancy Knowlton whose research examines the ecology and behavior of crustaceans, and the biology of coral reef populations. We also met Harilaos Lessios, who is doing work on the great mystery which occurred in the Caribbean last year: the death of the sea urchin.

I think anybody who has ever been to the seashore knows those black, spiny little animals. Most people think they are plants. They sit on rocks near the seashore.

If you step on them, you will know it for a number of days because they are highly poisonous. Ninety-nine percent of the most common species of sea urchins suddenly died last year—in 1 year. That could be a most serious thing. We do not know.

These people are doing research on it now trying to find out what happened.

I had the privilege of listening to a seminar given by Dr. Mary West Eberhard. She, with her husband, William G. Eberhard, is working on the ecology of insects. We do not like to get bitten or stung or whatever, but without the insects, we do not have tropical forests; we would not have any plants because the insects are the ones that do the fertilization of the seeds, the pollination. We simply have to know a lot about insects if we want to make sure we are going to continue to have tropical forestry.

In my estimation, and in that of many others, without our vast tropical forests, the world itself is imperiled. There were many other scientists in the Smithsonian that I did not have the privilege of meeting with or working with. I have given you only those I did go out with into the jungles and had the privilege of listening to them describe their own research.

I invite anyone to read the report of the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute to know more about the other scientists as well as the ones I have described here and the projects that they are working on.

All in all, I consider the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute to be one of the most important research projects in the world. The people working in it are outstanding, vital, extremely intelligent scientists doing one of the great jobs of scientific research. I cannot commend them or the Smithsonian highly enough.

I also commend the members of the Committee on Appropriations, its Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations of this House of Representatives and its chairman, SID YATES, and the ranking minority member, JOSEPH MCDADE, for the support that they have given the Smithsonian. I urge them to increase that support.

We also were briefly in Puerto Rico where we met with scientists at the research station there at the Caribbean National Forest and they are doing important work and hope to develop a model program there that will help peoples from all over the tropics come to learn more about their own tropical forests.

I think one of the most important things to think about when we think about the research station at Puerto Rico, the U.S. Department of Agriculture Research Station, as well as the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute, is that we are helping all the peoples of the tropical forest nations to learn more about their forestry. The programs that Puerto Rico would like to develop and that already have begun at the Smithsonian in Panama and in Costa Rica are important research and educational institutions where the people of the tropical forest nations are sending their young people to learn more about ways they can improve the use, and minimize the destruction, of their tropical forests.

There is one project that the Smithsonian has, financed by Exxon Oil Co. that is enabling dozens of young people to work in this tropical scientic endeavor.

There were many outstanding people at Puerto Rico; I will mention only several. Dr. Frank Wadsworth is considered the grand old man of tropical forestry. He knows more, or has forgotten more, perhaps, than most people will ever know. An outstanding person, and obviously a man who we will count on for much understanding in years to come.

A very bright young scientist, most impressive, is Dr. Ariel Lugo, whose ideas sparkled and who I was simply enthralled to be with, and I look forward to Dr. Lugo doing some great work in the years to come.

We had a State forester named Dick Schmidt, who is doing an outstanding job in the Puerto Rico state forests, and the supervisor of our own U.S. national forest, the Caribbean National Forest, Juan Munoz, was a very fine example of Forest Service personnel.

We will be writing a report on these research institutes and submitting it to the committee, and from time to time I hope to continue to apprise my colleagues in the House of Representatives of the state of the world's forests.

CENTRAL AMERICA—TIME AWASTING: TIME TO GET OUT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a resolution that invokes the War Powers Resolution with respect to Central America.

The War Powers Resolution is law, and it was enacted into law to prevent the gradual escalation of U.S. military activity in the absence of a realistic assessment of our interests, our capabilities, and our goals. This resolution was enacted into law in the wake of the Vietnam conflict and was intended to preserve the constitutional prerogative of the U.S. Congress to declare wars and to prevent so-called executive branch wars—wars that occur when we are confused about our motives or the depth or purpose of our commitment. The Congress has failed, in my opinion, and I have said so all last year and the year before, to ever use this law effectively to prevent avoidable tragedies—and we failed most recently to prevent the tragic loss of lives in Lebanon—a loss that could have been avoided if we had been honest with ourselves in acknowledging our confusion about why those young men were in Lebanon and what they were supposed to be accomplishing. The timely and effective implementation of the War Powers Resolution, by requiring the President to report on the level of our military activity, the nature of the threat requiring our military intervention, and the estimated duration of our activity, would not only force Government leaders to define the boundaries of the military activity but would be a means of holding the U.S. Government accountable for our military commitment.

The Congress once again has a chance to use the War Powers Resolution for its intended purpose—and that is to prevent tragedies in Central America as we failed to prevent in Vietnam and Lebanon. We have the opportunity to stop yet another executive war; we have the opportunity to preserve our constitutional right to declare when and where and for what purpose we will commit our young to war. The War Powers Resolution does not require death or injury to be suffered by American troops before the President must report to the Congress and the American people on the exact nature and purpose of the thousands of troops and millions of dollars of U.S. military activity in Central America. Yet we have already had deaths and serious bodily harm. They continue as I speak, because of the illicit, the illegal actions by the Commander in Chief, the President, in involving our armed services personnel in purely indigenous civil wars.

All that is required is for members of the U.S. Armed Forces to be sent into hostilities or into areas where the threat of hostility is imminent. And we have ample documentation of the presence of U.S. Armed Forces in Central America where they are under the threat of hostile action and, indeed, have been in the midst of major military efforts.

What began in the final days of the Carter administration as a short-term effort to provide emergency assistance to El Salvador against which I warned and protested, and in fact after 20 years in the House, I spoke for the first time with respect to Central America or Latin America, on April 1, 1980, for that purpose.

The President then was Democratic, President Jimmy Carter. This has now been escalated into a full scale war covering the entire region of Central America.

The known military aid to El Salvador—and I say known, because that is what statistically you can document—but even that has ballooned from the $5 million requested by former President Carter to over $196 million appropriated last year.

What is not recorded is that just in the last 3 years, the President's discretionary appropriations, or budget, has incremented exponentially 7½ times, 750 percent. I charge that the greatest portion of those really secret funds have been used and diverted for what Congress has not appropriated, in and around Central America and other places.

This does not include the unaccounted sums of money allocated or otherwise derived by the CIA.

□ 1330

And again because of the unaccountability of these powerful forces in our Government today to anybody, the President or the Congress.

The number of the so-called advisers present in El Salvador has risen from about 20 in 1981 to over 80 in 1984. There again we are talking about those that on a given count day they will count in El Salvador while most absent themselves across the border or offshore and come back after the count. But I know that it exceeds the official count considerably.

Military equipment sent to El Salvador has grown from six helicopters in 1980 to a total now of over 52 helicopters, planes, and jets, which also include as of about some 50 days the Huey attack monsters.

Now we declaim greatly against Russia in Afghanistan in using those tactics. You have seen pictures of Russian helicopters hovering over these peasants, completely horrified, frightened to death. And in cases, I am sure, shooting them down. But we are doing the same thing. Our Afghanistan is every country south of our border. There is no difference. It just has not been interpreted that way because our perceptions of ourselves of course are quite different from what the world perceptions, including our neighbors north and south of us have of our activities.

We now have for the first time these Huey attack gunships gunning down Salvadoran peasants and civilians. Just in the last week well over 100.

Military equipment, as I say, has expanded exponentially just in El Salvador where just 4 years ago the then Secretary of State General Haig drew the line and said, "We draw the line here and we are going to eliminate all of this." We are worse off. Even Napoleon Duarte, whom we have placed in power, cannot control the situation and will not because the very same forces which we have aligned ourselves all up and down in this new world, the forces of oppression, the forces of depotism are not going to relinquish power.

In addition to all of this the advisers that we have sent to El Salvador, for instance, for a period of months, so-called, or at most what was announced for a year are still present and that is 4 years. Thus far the administration has circumvented the provisions and the dictates of the War Powers Resolution to avoid the restrictions that that resolution was intended to impose. The law prohibits coordination between the U.S. military and the Salvadoran or any other unless the War Powers Act has been invoked and Congress has authorized such activity.

Yet, our military certainly is indeed coordinating efforts with the Salvadorans and others. Information gathered by U.S. reconnaissance missions flown over El Salvador and Nicaragua is sent through U.S. facilities in Panama to listening posts in the United States and back to U.S. advisers and CIA and their agents in that area in Central America. For this certianly would be coordination between the United States and the Salvadorans, the Salvadoran officials simply listen to the message as they are transmitted to the advisers and the others down the line.

The so-called interdiction effort in Nicaragua has escalated in cost from $19 million in fiscal year 1982 to $150 million in fiscal year 1984. There again, that is just the tip of the iceberg which you can document. So I am placing it in the RECORD.

But I know as a matter of fact though naturally how can you document a CIA activity. That the figure really now has reached, if you include this activity in Salvador and in Honduras and against Nicaragua, a billion dollars plus. This original effort to interdict the flow of arms from Nicaragua into El Salvador has escalated into an undeclared war on the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. We hypocritically recognize the regime. We have an accepted Ambassador with credentials and while the Ambassador is clucking friendly sounds between nations at peace, our President is involved in a war against that regime. The CIA has tried for more than a year and a half to assassinate the leaders of that coalition government up to recently in Nicaragua.

We have through the CIA and other agents and with our money even our equipment, even our U.S.-made bombs attempted to destroy the port facilities, other facilities of a public nature in Nicaragua.

CIA backed so-called Contras in Nicaragua have killed 1,600 Nicaraguans, 600 of which were civilians, including 100 children under the age of 12. And these CIA backed Contras in Nicaragua have caused 255 billion dollars' worth of damage to the Nicaraguan economy.

There are even reports that CIA supported forces have killed Hondurans when they perceive as obstructionist or who are unsupportive of the Contra operations based in Honduras. There is no question that it was a CIA that attempted to assassinate the so-called Commandante Sero, the original revolutionary with the so-called now Sandinista leaders that knocked off the dictator Somoza but who because of whatever you want to call it disputation in the inner councils fled, went to Venezuela for a while and then was attracted to join the rebels, but who protested and refused to receive CIA money or work in conjunction with the CIA backed Contras, most of whom are ex-Somozistas. For that and for his absolute refusal and threat to lay down arms and remove himself from the scene of opposition he was almost killed at a meeting in which unfortunately a member of the press, a reporter following to this conference in the jungles was killed in the explosion.

Commandante Sero is now removed from the scene and is in one of the South American countries still fearful that he will be followed there and eliminated by the CIA agents.

In Honduras U.S. military aid has increased for Honduras the poorest country in Central or South America that aid has increased from $4 million in fiscal year 1980 to $77.5 million in fiscal year 1984, officially. U.S. bases in Honduras were to be temporary and yet a recent GAO report states, "it is clear that a more extended use was also contemplated by DOD."

Thus far, the United States has built 132 buildings in Honduras, including barracks, offices, a PX, and mess halls and have also constructed a road network and fuel storage facilities. The air base runway has been lengthened and improved to accommodate U.S. aircraft as we are witnessing now when we see the painful experience of the C-130 and the apparent loss of life of all those aboard.

We have thousands of U.S. military personnel present in Honduras. And of those, over 85 percent of that personnel are ethnic minorities, either black or brown. That is interesting but reminiscent of what I spoke out in the middle of the Vietnamese conflict in 1965. It was I who pointed out the disproportionate involvement of the poor and the ethnic minority which, of course, are synonymous. In 1965, I pointed out, in the summer, that over 45 percent of those in the areas of conflict were draftees and, of course, those were preponderantly the poor and the ethnic minorities.

If we wait for something to happen, for thousands of young American men to die in Central America, as they did in Vietnam, and as I know they will be soon if this President does not change his policies—and I was hoping and praying that after his overwhelming victory he would have full opportunity to review those policies and reconsider a unilateral military intervention, which has been the centerpiece of his policy, if there is a policy.

But, no. He clearly evinces, as of this week, a determined continuation of his war.

Well, if we do not, then we will have to make up for our lack of foresight with subsequent militarism in order to justify the deaths of American soldiers, which are in the books, they have already happened, and we have it happening every day. Even as I am speaking here today, official service personnel of our country are engaged in conflict and in direct combat in Central America.

We have lost a few, and they have not been labeled that way, and the whole operations have been deceptive and a subterfuge by describing the personnel and the actions in what the CIA used to call plausible denials in case they are killed or captured.

We have no clear purpose in Central America. I know we have no military purpose and should have brought back every one of our soldiers in all of Central America 3 years, 4 years ago. We have no clear conception of the depth of our commitment there. And if there is anybody in this body foolish enough to think that in case when the alarms sound and the resolutions are passed here, like we did in the Gulf of Tonkin case, that the conflict is going to be limited to Nicaragua, let me assure my colleagues that is an egregious error. We will be, as we are now, ensuring that our children, grandchildre,n and great-grandchildren will be in an eternal enmity and a hostile world with the very people with whom we must share and destiny dictates we must share this part of the world.

We have no clear purpose, we have no clear concept, and the perceptions of our leaders are misperceptions. That world is not the world of the President's concept, which goes back to 1929. It is another world. It is not even the world it was 5 years ago. And I hope we can avoid paying the unnecessary price for that misperception.

There is no question in my mind that we must reassess our involvement in Central America even though I believe it is rather late. I urge the Congress to invoke the War Powers Resolution and hold the President, as well as ourselves, as elected Representatives of the American people, accountable for the undeclared war in Central America; and I know that many of my colleagues have young will-be-eligible men. I just say to you: Do you want your boy now, even though we have a volunteer Army and you do not have to worry about it now, do you want your boy to go and to fight and to die in the jungles of Central America? For what? For no better purpose than Chiquita banana.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD an article from the Washington Post of Thursday, January 24, 1985, entitled "Under Fire in a Nicaraguan Tank":

UNDER FIRE IN A NICARAGUAN TANK

(By John Lantigua)

TELEPNEAC, NICARAGUA—The Sandinistas have launched a large offensive against their rebel adversaries here in the northern mountains, but we were told the road was free of contra guerrillas and our ride with a military convoy would almost certainly be uneventful.

In the past, Sandinista officials maintained that the front line in their war against these rebels, who were organized and funded by the CIA, was too dangerous for foreign correspondents, although they did allow journalists for their own publications to cover combat units.

But the policy has changed in recent weeks and on Monday, with five other journalists, I found myself in a heavily protected convoy about three miles north of the village of Telpaneca.

We were driving slowly through the densely wooded hillsides when we were ambushed from three sides. For 40 minutes I huddled inside a Soviet-made tank with its cannon firing inches from my head.

When our journey began, about 20 Sandinista militiamen were riding atop two tanks. Another 20 militiamen were following in two green military supply trucks. We had been heading toward a military command post about five miles away, where the tanks and their 76-mm cannons were to reinforce about 800 Sandinista soldiers engaged with an estimated 400 rebels.

Commander Manuel Salvatierra, in charge of the Sandinista offensive, said his troops were trying to inflict high numbers of casualties on the contras to force most of the rebel forces to retreat from the coffee zones. This would allow the government to move coffee pickers into these zones to save the harvest, which provides about a third of the country's foreign exchange.

I had put on a tankman's leather helmet, to protect my hearing in case the cannon had to be used, and ducked into the tight confines of the tank.

Lying on my back, I was wedged against the front bulkhead almost cheek to cheek with the tank driver, Miguel Angel Medrano, 23. He also had his leather helmet buttoned tight around his chin. He was watching the road through three small bulletproof windows, and steering the tank by fits and starts, hauling levers that controlled the speed of the tank treads. Sometimes he stuck his head out the open hatch to get a better view.

The other two crewmen were Carlos Barrero, 23, crew chief and artilleryman, and his assistant, Jose Ramon Calero, 19, in charge of ammunition. They had the main hatch open, and were sitting above me on the edge, enjoying the ride.

I had seen the barrels of the cannon and the 50-mm machine gun outside the tank. Now I saw the metal ammunition belt loaded with shells curling out of the gun and disappearing into a metal box on the floor.

There was no conversation because of the great rumbling noise of the tank. So I made unsuccessful attempts to read the Russian labels on the dials next to me, counted the gold-tipped cannon shells—40 of them more than a foot long—and looked up at the two tankmen sitting on the open hatch envying the breeze they were enjoying.

Suddenly everything changed. The two men above me plunged down into the tank and I heard a loud noise on all sides.

The piece of blue sky above me went black as the hatch was slammed shut. Medrano, the driver, just 18 inches from me, also slammed shut his hatch. Now he was grimacing through his three small windows, with a look of fear and anger, pulling wildly at the gears as Barrero screamed at him.

"Where are they? Where are they?" screamed Barrero.

"They're right in front of us. Right in front. The sons of bitches," screamed the driver. "Give them the cannon, the cannon."

I realized then that the sound that engulfed me was the sound of bullets hitting the tank, like taps from a hammer against the metal, but many of them, like rain. We had been ambushed.

I thought of the people who had been riding atop the tank, but now there was no way to know what was happening to them. I found out later that the tanks had just been entering a sweeping mountain curve when rebels in three positions along the road and across a gulch had opened up on the convoy. The people on top had dived into a culvert.

Inside I had to put my legs up suddenly because the turret was turning and Barrero was cranking the barrel down while Medrano continued to scream at him.

"On the road ahead; they're running on the road ahead." Barrero pulled at the leather pouch filled with sand tied to the cannon trigger and the first cannon blast sounded. The cannon recoiled, a great flame leaped out the back and the cannon seemed to leap forward and then jump back. There was a smell of powder in the confined compartment and smoke mixed with the screaming.

An empty cannon shell fell into an asbestos bag at my knee, the same bag that had caught the flame of the cannon blast. Calero, the munitions man, slammed another shell into the breech, as Barrero swiveled the turret and Medrano, squinting fiercely through his three windows, shouted that they should level the house just above them.

"Hit the house. That's where they're hiding," he yelled. The cannon sounded again and the tank rocked. Sandinista troops later said they had seen the blast and that the houise, which they said had been abandoned by its owners earlier in this guerrilla war, had been demolished.

The radios built into the leather helmets were not working and Medrano and Barrero, who was using a sight built into his hatch, continued to scream at eacth other at the top of their lungs, as they saw contras on all sides.

Medrano took the tank farther up the road where he had seen the blue uniforms of the rebels, and Barrero continued to blast away at the densely wooded hills. The impact of the bullets on the outside of the tank had stopped, the contras apparently having given up trying to penetrate it with small arms fire. But suddenly the tank took a jolt that shook it for the first and only time in the ambush.

Barrero looked genuinely scared.

"What was that?" he screamed, swiveling the turret all around and scanning the mountainside.

"It was a monkey," screamed Medrano, using Sandinista slang for a U.S.-made M79 grenade.

The tank men said later they had no fear of the M79, but only of RPG antitank grenades, hard-tipped projectiles made to penetrate a tank's armor and then explode. Sandinista soldiers and one of the journalists later said the contras had fired several RPGs during the battle.

At one point the tank's gears froze. Barrero said later that with a well placed RPG at that moment, we might have been "cooked."

Medrano, unable to move the tank, pulled desperately at his levers, as Barrero screamed at him to move. Barrero kept the turret swiveling, peppering all around them with machine gunfire and pounding away with the cannon in all directions at anyone who might want a clear shot at them. The tank sat dead still for about two minutes and the atmosphere inside went from tense to desperate. The air filtration system was working, but the heat and smoke of the cannon blasts were still in the air.

Then a blast of their own cannon shook the gears loose, and we moved again.

Now the tank behind us was moving in reverse back down the road, and ours did the same. The enemy fire had diminished, but Barrero was still peppering the hillside with his machine gun. Medrano yelled to him to watch out for the Sandinista troops who were now in front of us.

Rounding the bend back down the road, I saw the journalists who had been atop the tank, now walking ahead of me. One of them, Luis Diaz, a television cameraman, had suffered a shrapnel wound in the leg, but it was not serious and he was able to walk.

One Sandinista militiaman was killled and three were wounded in the ambush. The shooting had lasted about 40 minutes and the three young tankmen said it was the fiercest action they had seen in their six months in the war.

"If they weren't such cowards, they would shoot better," said Barrero. But the tanks had used much of their ammunition and had to turn back. It wasn't until much later in the day that three other tanks were able to reach the Sandinista command post.

REINTRODUCTION OF FOOD IRRADIATION LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MORRISON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today, along with several of my colleagues, I am reintroducing legislation which promotes the use of ionizing energy as a postharvest treatment for food commodities. Senator SLADE GORTON of Washington State is also introducing an identical bill today in the Senate.

The original House cosponsors of this legislation are: Mr. TOM FOLEY, Mr. MEL PRICE, Mr. PAT ROBERTS, Mr. WES WATKINS, Mr. BILL WHITEHURST, Mr. VIN WEBER, Mr. JOHN MCCAIN, Mr. JOE SKEEN, Mr. ROD CHANDLER, Mr. CHARLES PASHAYAN, Mrs. MARILYN LLOYD, Mr. JIM LEACH, Mr. TOM TAUKE, Mrs. BEVERLY BYRON, Mr. BOB SMITH of Oregon, Mr. SAM STRATTON, Mr. NEIL SMITH of Iowa, Mr. BERKLEY BEDELL, Mr. VIC FAZIO, Mr. ELWOOD HILLIS, Mr. COOPER EVANS, Mr. TONY COEHLO, Mr. HAROLD VOLKMER, and Mr. JIM LIGHFOOT.

This bill, the Federal Food Irradiation Development and Control Act of 1985, is similar to legislation I introduced last year, H.R. 5605. (See the May 7, 1984, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, starting at page H3438). I have made slight revisions to this year's bill, but the general thrust expressed in H.R. 5605 has remained the same. Last year's bill was cosponsored by 36 Members and was the subject of two committee hearings, one before the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture of the Agriculture Committee on May 9, 1984, and the other before the Energy Research and Production Subcommittee of the Science and Technology Committee on July 26.

The principles embodied in this legislation were endorsed by 15 national associations last year. These include the American Medical Association, the National Food Processors Association, the Grocery Manufacturers Association, the American Farm Bureau, the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture, the National Grange, and food associations representing the concerns of fresh fruit and vegetable growers, and pork and other meat, poultry, and fish producers.

This broad-based and diverse support for food irradiation should come as little surprise. The impact of food irradiation as a postharvest treatment could be revolutionary; it could be the most important development in food preservation since the introduction of canning and freezing in the last century. The possibilities are unlimited and exciting.

Food irradiation can protect food from pests much as ethylene dibromide [EDB] does. But unlike EDB, it will not leave a toxic residue on the food. If other postharvest fumigants are restricted by the Environmental Protection Agency, food irradiation is viewed by many as one of the most effective and safe substitutes.

Besides acting as a possible substitute for EDB and other fumigants, low doses of irradiation eliminate trichinosis in pork, and stop the Medfly in citrus fruits and the codling moth in apples. Irradiation could also destroy botulinum and salmonella in red meats, poultry, and fish and extend the shelf life of fresh fruits, vegetables and grains.

There is a growing international consensus behind food irradiation. Two international organizations, the Joint FAO/IAEA/WHO Expert Committee and the Codex Alimentarins Commission, have recommended the use of irradiation on food up to doses 10 times higher than FDA is now proposing. Twenty-eight countries have approved various uses of gamma radiation on at least 40 different foods. Since about a quarter of the food supply in the Third World is lost to spoilage, food irradiation could also play a major role in helping feed the world.

The food irradiation technology is not new; we have accumulated over 40 years of research data. In fact, over these past four decades, food irradiation has been studied in more detail than any other food preservation technique. Based upon this extensive study, experts across the world agree that food irradiation is safe and wholesome.

Food irradiation is ionizing energy which passes through food killing organisms and microorganisms. As a farmer, I have always marveled at our expanding use of other energy waves such as visual light, radio, TV, microwave, and ultraviolet light. These energy sources have become friends, and servants. Ionizing energy used to irradiate food is similar in many ways.

As with these energy sources I just mentioned, the food absorbs only the energy of the radioactive source, not the source's radioactivity. For instance, an x ray in the dentist office does not make your teeth radioactive and the x ray table in the doctor's office does not absorb radioactivity even after thousands of x rays. In a sense, exposing food to gamma radiation, x ray, or machine-made radiation, is similar to exposing it to electric light: such exposure, no matter how long, will never cause the food to generate electricity.

Indeed, it is physically impossible for food irradiation to induce radiation in food at any of the dose levels now being studied. It is true that irradiation may change the food slightly, but these changes are no more significant than the changes that occur from boiling or freezing food. Experts across the world agree that food irradiation is safe and wholesome. It is interesting to note that severely ill patients in our hospitals and our astronauts in space are sometimes served foods sterilized with gamma radiation.

I view food irradiation as a food safety issue. It kills undesirable biological elements which contaminate food without seriously eroding the food's nutritional value. It retards spoilage and keeps the food fresh and more natural tasting. It does not leave a residue on the food-like fumigants. The endorsement of food irradiation by the American Medical Association at their national convention last June is a true testament to its safety and wholesomeness.

It is clear that food irradiation holds substantial promise for farmers, the food processing and agricultural export industries, the consumer, and the many millions who are on the brink of starvation. Despite this technology's acceptance by the scientific and academic community, however, food irradiation has been slow in gaining the necessary approval from regulatory bodies and the public.

The first step to remedy this sluggish Government approval of food irradiation is a proposed Food and Drug Administration regulation which was promulgated last year and should be finalized sometime during 1985. The regulation permits limited application of food irradiation primarily for fresh fruits and vegetables up to a dose of 100 kilorads, a dose which is one-tenth the standard now accepted by most international authorities. This limited regulation is an excellent first step in gaining commercial and public acceptance of this technology. However, we need to build up the regulation with legislation to insure a favorable regulatory climate and to promote consumer acceptance of food irradiation.

Hence, the need for legislation I am introducing today. First of all, the bill defines irradiation of food as a process and expressly excludes irradiation from being defined as a food additive. I firmly believe that defining food irradiation as a food additive, as it is currently defined due to a 1958 amendment to the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, is wholly inappropriate. Food irradiation is a process, much like boiling, freezing, or cooking in a microwave oven, and not an additive. Despite the change in definition so that food irradiation will be considered a process, FDA under the bill will still retain general authority to regulate food irradiation for consumer protection in much the same way as they do now.

The bill also provides for ongoing research and development of food irradiation, national uniformity of food irradiation regulations, and further provides explicit authority for leasing of federally owned irradiation source materials to the private sector to ensure an adequate supply while meeting Federal safety and transportation standards.

The centerpiece of the bill is the establishment of a Joint Operating Commission to facilitate acceptance of food irradiation. The Commission will operate within the Department of Agriculture and would coordinate currently fragmented research and information exchange efforts. It will also act as a liaison to promote consumer acceptance of food irradiation and private development. The intent of the Commission is to do nothing more than provide a forum to coordinate largely existing activities and to facilitate consumer understanding of this technology.

Most agree that the public in general has an emotional, almost fearful response, to food irradiation. This bill, particularly the Joint Operating Commission, should promote open discussion of food irradiation so that public concerns about the use of irradiation can be addressed.

No matter how successful and safe food irradiation proves to be, it will never obtain large scale commercial application unless there is consumer acceptance. The consumer needs reassurance from the Federal Government, and the Joint Operating Commission is the least restrictive way to facilitate public knowledge and subsequent acceptance. It is most certainly not my intent to provide a mechanism for Government to get in the way of private enterprise progress in development of this exciting technology.

A section-by-section summary of the bill and other relevant information on food irradiation follow:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY OF FOOD IRRADIATION BILL

Section 1.—Short Title:

The bill is called the "Federal Food Irradiation Development and Control Act of 1985".

Section 2.—Finding and Purposes:

The bill declares that food irradiation at regulated doses is safe and wholesome, is effective as a food preservative technique, and is one of the substitutes for postharvest fumigants, including ethylene dibromide (EDB). The bill further finds that irradiation is a process and does not induce radioactivity in food. Finally, Congress finds that a coordinated effort to advance food irradiation is needed.

Section 3.—Definitional and Regulatory Changes:

Section 201(s) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by deleting "sources of radiation" from the definition of food additive and further exempting "food irradiation treatment" from being defined as an additive. A definition is added to the Act which defines "food irradiation process" as a food treatment in which ionizing energy is applied to food to destroy microorganisms which cause infestation, disease, and spoilage.

Section 409 of FDA Enabling Act is further amended to make conforming changes. These changes would generally insert "or food irradiation process" every time "food additive" is used. Thus, the regulatory provisions of section 409 would apply to "food additive or food irradiation process". However, there are a few exceptions so that requirements of the petition approval process of section 409 which are clearly intended to apply only to additives are specifically exempted from being considered for food irradiation process.

Section 4.—National Uniformity:

The section declares that it is the intent of Congress to require national uniformity in the regulation of food irradiation process. Under the section, no state or political subdivision could establish any food irradiation requirement which is "in addition to or different from" the FDA requirements. This section essentially restates the acknowledged common law that federal law usually preempts conflicting and duplicative state law.

Section 5.—Leasing of Byproducts Material for Food Irradiation:

Section 81 of the Atomic Energy Act is amended to clarify the Department of Energy's existing authority to lease defense nuclear byproducts material to the private sector. The amendments would clarify current leasing guidelines so that byproducts are leased at fair market value (with profits going to the Treasury) and should be leased to encourage food irradiation process.

Section 6.—Establishment of Joint Operating Commission:

This section of the bill establishes within the Department of Agriculture a Joint Operating Commission for Food Irradiation (JOCFI). JOCFI shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary shall provide necessary staff and office facilities. There is also a general authorization to carry out the activities of the Commission.

JOCFI shall consist of eight members including one individual, appointed by the President, who will represent the interests of the general public. The other seven members will be one representative each from the Departments of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, Energy, Commerce, and the Environmental Protection Agency, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Agency for International Development. The appointments of the initial eight members shall be made within 90 days following the enactment of the Act and all vacancies shall be filled within 60 days. The seven members of JOCFI who are already employees of the Federal Government shall receive a salary equivalent to grade GS-15 for each day service.

The functions of the JOCFI Commission include: (1) to coordinate and review all federal on-going and future food irradiation research and development activities. Additional research shall be conducted at Agricultural Research Service stations, at land-grant colleges, or at federal multi-program laboratories; (2) to collect and consolidate all research data already gathered by various federal agencies; (3) to coordinate information exchange activities on food irradiation process with various federal agencies, interested private organizations, and the general public; (4) to encourage investment by private sources in food irradiation process; (5) to consider and make recommendations to decision-making bodies on labelling of products processed with irradiation; (6) to encourage better understanding by the general public of food irradiation process; and (7) to petition FDA, if deemed appropriate, under section 409 of the FDA enabling Act to expand the scope of regulations allowing for commercial food irradiation.

IRRADIATION PROPOSED TO TREAT FOOD

(By Chris Lecos)

[Irradiation doses are measured in rads. The term "rad" is shorthand for "radiation absorbed dose." A low dose for food irradiation is in the range of 0 to 100 kilorads; a medium dose is 100 to 1,000 kilorads or 1 megarad; a high dose is 1,000 to 5,000 kilorads or 1 to 5 megarads. A kilorad is equal to 1,000 rads; a megarad is equal to 1 million rads. In more recent years the germ "gray" (Gy) also has been used to describe dose levels. One hundred rads equals 1 gray.]

In the not-too-distant future, American shoppers can expect to buy foods treated with radiation to control insect and bacterial contamination. Although this may make some consumers uneasy, the Food and Drug Administration says the foods will be safe and wholesome to eat.

More than 30 years of research, most of it government sponsored, has gone into food irradiation. After years of careful study and review of this research and technological development, FDA has proposed a regulation that would expand uses of ionizing radiation on such foods as fresh fruits, vegetables and spices. In the early 1960s, FDA issued regulations allowing processors to irradiate wheat and wheat flour to control insect contamination and to irradiate potatoes to slow the development of sprouts. However, no commercial uses ever resulted.

In announcing its latest proposal, FDA stressed that this treatment of food at the levels of radiation proposed would add no radioactivity to the foods, nor would it expose consumers to any radioactivity. "Food that is not made radioactive cannot expose consumers to radiation," the agency emphasized, adding that the type of radiation to be allowed "will not induce in foods any radioactivity that can be detected, even by methods that detect the presence of radioactive isotopes that occur naturally in all foods."

Although irradiation does not make food radioactive, it can produce chemical changes in it. A special committee formed by FDA's Bureau of Foods reviewed the world's scientific literature on the effects of irradiation and concluded that any changes that would occur in food are inconsequential compared to changes that occur normally in storage or in cooking. FDA scientists also note that in all studies in which irradiated foods were fed to animals over many generations, no adverse effects were found that could be attributed to the irradiation, a point also made by international and regulatory groups in other countries.

Currently, many foods are treated with chemical additives, pesticides, or some other substance to protect them from insect and microbial contaminants and to give them extended shelf life. Irradiation presents another prospect for maintaining the quality of foods. It might be used, for example, as a replacement for the controversial fumigant ethylene dibromide (EDB), to control insects in certain agricultural products. EDB is a known animal carcinogen (cancer-causing agent).

As announed in the Federal Register on Feb. 14 [1984] FDA is proposing:

To permit such foods as fresh fruits and vegetables to be treated with a dose level not to exceed 1 kilogray (the equivalent of 100 kilorads or 100,000 rads or radiation to inhibit the "growth and maturation" of the products as well as to kill insects that are present after harvest. In other words, the proposal would allow irradiation to keep fruits and vegetables from spoiling, thus extending the shelf life for both sellers and buyers. That level of irradiation also would permit growers to treat products for the kind of insect infestation that occurred several years ago in California and Florida, where citrus and other crops were threatened by the Mediterranean fruit fly (Medfly).

To allow the treatment of a wide variety of spices, including dried and dehydrated onions and garlic, with a dose level of up to 30 kilograys to kill insects or bacteria in the products. FDA officials pointed out that the higher dose level could be allowed because spices are used in small amounts that make no nutritional contribution to the human diet. However, like some other food ingredients, spices may contain high bacterial loads, and, when the bacteria-laden spices are added to processed foods, they can be sources of contamination.

Technically, the regulation would allow the use of irradiation—up to the 100-kilorad maximum—on any food where insects may be a problem. As a practical matter, however, its main uses would be with foods such as fruits, vegetables, spices and grains.

A key part of FDA's proposal states that food treated with ionizing radiation "shall receive the minimal radiation dose reasonably required to accomplish its intended technical effect and not more than the maximum dose specified by the applicable regulation." Thus, despite the 100-kilorad ceiling, FDA would expect industry to use only as much radiation as would be needed.

The maximum dose is not needed, for example, to prevent potato sprouting. The 100 kilorads "would turn the potatoes into mush," an FDA scientist explained. Only 5 to 15 kilorads are needed to keep potatoes from sprouting. That is the limit FDA permits in its existing regulation for this use.

Companies that plan to irradiate food would be expected to specify the procedure they would use and the dose levels. In addition, industry must to able to demonstrate to FDA upon request that its irradiation procedures were established by experts qualified in radiation processing.

Under the proposal, FDA also would monitor industry compliance with requirements. Food producers would be required to maintain records of radiation doses used for up to one year past the expected shelf life of a product, with all records subject to examination by FDA inspectors.

Besides complying with FDA's irradiation regulation, food processors would have to adhere to federal plant and worker safety requirements of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Irradiated foods shipped in bulk to a processor for further processing must bear a labeling statement that says: "Treated with ionizing radiation—do not irradiate again." The wording would have to appear on the container and on any invoices or bills of lading.

Foods sold at retail would not be labeled to indicate that they had been treated with irradiation. However, FDA invited public comment on retail labeling, and the proposal will not become effective until after the agency has reviewed all comments and has published a final regulation.

FDA's responsibility for regulating the irradiation of foods comes under the 1958 Food Additives Amendment to the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, which classified irradiation as a food additive. Thus, if a food firm wants to use irradiation, it must demonstrate the safety of its process to FDA's satisfaction before the treated food products can be marketed.

The irradiation of foods has worldwide implications. It is viewed by economic experts as a means of increasing food supplies. It could also mean expanding exports of American agricultural products. The process could help save some of the estimated 25 to 30 percent of the world's food supply that is lost each year because of pests and spoilage.

A number of countries already allow certain foods to be irradiated. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, International Atomic Energy Agency, and World Health Organization have issued general standards for irradiated foods. The Institute of Food Technologists reported recently that between 1958 and 1981, 24 countries had approved irradiation treatment of some 40 foods.

A report issued last November by the U.S. Department of Commerce's Bureau of Industrial Economics predicted that "many important domestic and international markets for irradiated foods could develop if FDA permits the use of irradiation technology." The U.S. Department of Energy also has been interested in food irradiation, spending about $7 million annually on its development. One of the byproducts of spent nuclear fuel processing is cesium-137, a potential source of radiation for food. The Commerce Department report noted: "Any use of cesium-137 for irradiation substantially reduces the disposal cost of nuclear plant wastes."

There is nothing new or revolutionary about the idea of using radiation on foods. As far back as 1908, a technique was developed by a Philadelphia man for killing tobacco pests with X-rays. Twelve years later, a French scientist discovered that ionizing radiation could be used to preserve food.

The World War II need to feed millions of men and women in uniform brought renewed interest in food irradiation. In 1943, the U.S. Army asked the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) for its view of whether the shelf life of food could be extended by irradiation. By 1947, MIT reported that the process was feasible. In 1953, various federally funded irradiation research projects were under the Army Quartermaster Corp's Research and Development Command Laboratory in Natick, Mass. There, fruits, vegetables, dairy products, fish and meat were exposed systematically to gamma rays and other forms of energy bombardment.

Most of this early research was federally sponsored, and enough attention had been focused on the issue to prompt Congress, when it passed the 1958 food additives legislation, to adopt specific provisions on food irradiation. The legislation permits FDA to adopt new regulations permitting food irradiation uses, and it empowers FDA to take action if a food has been intentionally irradiated without a regulation covering the proposed irradiation use. "Obviously," the preamble to the proposed regulation notes, "Congress did not intend that the radiation itself be tested, but rather its effects on food." Thus, FDA continued, "to issue a food additive regulation for the source of radiation, the agency must be assured with reasonable certainty that no harm will result from the proposed use."

It is difficult to predict how wide the future uses of food irradiation will spread. Much depends on industry interest and willingness to make the substantial investment the technology demands.

When food is irradiated, most of the radiation energy passes through the food without being absorbed. However, some of the rays do not pass through the food. This absorbed energy slows maturation and kills insects.

Irradiation is sometimes described as a "cold" process because it does not cause a significant rise in the temperature of food. The irradiation—through gamma rays, electron beams, or by X-rays—does cause chemical changes in a food, producing new chemical substances called radiolytic products. The extent of change and the amount of radiolytic products that result depend on the amount of radiation absorbed. Because each food varies in its chemical composition, the changes from irradiation differ among foods.

Even small changes that may pose no safety concerns can affect flavor, texture and other characteristics. These might be unnoticed by some consumers but discernible to others. But these changes are not produced by irradiation alone. Most processing techniques—including cooking, canning and freezing—have some effect on the flavor and texture of foods.

Over the years, there has been considerable research on the various radiation doses of foods so that, in effect, scientists have a pretty good idea what range of radiation is generally needed for specific effects. Meanwhile, the agency has issued this cautionary statement: "The exact dose that will achieve a particular effect in a specific food without otherwise damaging the food is not yet known in all cases . . . ." Further research is needed before acceptable dosage levels can be determined for commercial uses.

SENATE—Thursday, January 24, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, January 21, 1985)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable GORDON J. HUMPHREY, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Father in Heaven, we thank You for our Senate leadership and we pray that they may enjoy the fresh, warm, renewing winds of the spirit of God as they set their sails for the next 2 years. Remembering the pressures and frustrations of the closing days of the 98th Congress, help them to establish ways of going that will ensure maximum efficiency and productivity. The sign along a dirt road in North Dakota many years ago is relevant: "Pick your ruts carefully, you will be in them a long time."

We are grateful, gracious God, for strong leaders and for the reliable support they will receive from families, peers, staffs, and all the faithful people who work in this place. Help us to demonstrate the unlimited power of a body of people who love one another and serve one another as we serve our Nation and our God. In His name who was the Servant of Servants. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, January 24, 1985.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable GORDON J. HUMPHREY, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. HUMPHREY thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the acting majority leader is recognized.

THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I will not use the time allocated to the majority leader this morning. I will, however, yield some of it to Senator GOLDWATER.

Mr. President, the words of the Chaplain are always most appropriate. I have always loved that story of picking the rut carefully because you will be in it for a long, long time. That is one of my favorites, and we do that beautifully around here. We stay in them too long, however, even when we could get out.

But he is always gentle in his comments and always very authentic and a great source of inspiration to us all.

Mr. President, with that, I yield 5 minutes, or such time as is required, to my colleague from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of my friend from Wyoming, particularly his remarks about the Chaplain. I, too, have always enjoyed his prayers. I will ask him in quiet that when he says one prayer for the body, he say three for me.

The U.S. DEFICIT—A NEED FOR COURAGE

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr President, about 40 years ago, during the first term of Franklin Roosevelt in the midst of the Great Depression, we first started to spend money that we did not have to try to help the economy. Even at that time, I began to worry and to speak out about the spending of money that the Federal Government did not have. I was greatly concerned because, regardless of how much money Roosevelt spent, we did not come out of the depression. We did not cure the depression until World War II started and that, finally, brought the depression to a close.

Let us not misunderstand; we do not want any more wars, whether it ends in depressions or not. However, I am worried today more than I have ever been about our country being in a state of economic trouble that not even a war could produce cure. When World War II ended, there was every reason to expect that the vast amount of money that we had spent during that war would come to an end. For a short time, it appeared that would happen. But then, we went through the experience of the cold war, Korea and the experience of Vietnam and, all the while, we continued to be in a war economy.

But, even when peace came, our deficits continued to mount and mount and mount. I will say, without any particular fear of contradiction, that it was not the spending related to Korea and Vietnam that produced the major part of our deficit that we are confronted with today. Our problem has been the spending, during war and peace, on what we call welfare and Government support spending.

At the outset of the President's first term and even during his campaign for that first term, he continually called attention to the deficit, the increased interest we had to pay on it, the accompanying inflation and the accompanying high interest rates. Even then, he pledged to do everything in his power to get it down.

Just the other day, President Reagan started his second term of office after having been elected by the highest plurality ever enjoyed by a President. But what are we looking at? The deficit is higher than it has ever been. The budget is going to be higher.

Yet, a strange thing has been happening during this period of increased deficit. During the last half-year, prime interest rates have gone down three times and the indications are growing that they will go down some more. This leads me to believe that a new source or new form of capital is being created in this country. I will not argue for this nor against it nor for the reason or against any reason. But, nevertheless, it is happening. If this trend continues and our economy continues on at an increasing rate of growth, the deficit problems will be relieved greatly. But, and this is a great big but, if it does not do that and we are merely going through a temporary increase in our economy and then the interest rates start to go up again and the deficits persist, then the people of this country are going to have all manner of hell to pay along with all kinds of economic trouble. The possibility of national bankruptcy is a distinct reality if we persist in unabated spending across the board.

As chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I will not make the flat statement that we can not decrease the money spent there. Already, I have suggested that we close the unneeded military bases in this country and I am going to introduce legislation to accomplish that. Secretary of Defense Weinberger has already done a very commendable job on not reorganizing the defense establishment, but in deorganizing it. I mean by that, that he has been putting men who were in uniform back into the field and then reducing the civilian staff no longer needed. There is much more that can be done in this field and the Secretary knows this, but he is going to need the help of the Congress to get this accomplished.

The other day, I picked up a book written by John Kennedy before he became President. It was called "Profiles in Courage" and it dealt with those men in the Senate whom he had judged to be the great ones. Their common attribute was one of personal courage. While I did no reread the book completely, as I skimmed through it the thought hit me that everyone should read that book now. If there ever was a time in the history of our Nation when we need individual and collective courage, starting with the President right on down through every elected official including the citizenry as a whole, it is now. We must take a hard look at the deficit that is going to grow. We will have to look at tax rates that will have to be raised. We must look at an economy that is good now, but might not be so good in the future. And then, we begin to look at the problems and possible solutions.

I mention the need for courage because we are looking at things that are pretty close to people. We are looking at things that influence votes. As a result, the question that keeps coming to my mind is, "Do we have people of enough courage to take a hard look at the problems that face us and to say no to those things that need to be said no to?"

As much as I do not like to say it, we are in a welfare state, whether anyone cares to admit it or not. I have tried to get the last four Presidents to talk to the American people about this and to warn them what would have to be done to get us out of this situation, but none have faced the issue. A lot of people will say, "What's wrong with the welfare State?" Well, as a matter of history, no country in the world has ever gotten out of one. All of the welfare States that I can remember wound up as a dictatorship and most of them wound up broke.

It could be that this country of ours can find a solution that would enable us to go on with uncontrolled spending in the welfare field and, at the same time, take care of our defense needs. If we can, we should start trying to do it without trying to go along under the pretense that we do not have to do anything but continue on our present path.

Let us face up to this one truth. Let us tell the American people about the actual condition of this country and of the very difficult, if not impossible, task of getting us out of it. Let me remind my colleagues that it is not enough just to say, "Let's cut the defense budget." We could eliminate the entire defense budget and still not get out of the trouble we are in. And I would remind my colleagues also that the first charge to us in the Constitution is to defend our country. But that is irrelevant. What I am worried about is that the fiscal situation we can find ourselves in can lead to the fiscal bankruptcy of our country and the end of our dream of freedom.

Now, what is it going to take to get us out of this? First of all, the President has to go to the American people in very understandable language and simple terms to explain to them that Social Security is in bad shape, that civil service retirement is in trouble, also railroad retirement. The retirement funds of all the military personnel stand in jeopardy and there are many, many welfare performances we are funding today that need to be cut down or eliminated completely. Also, there are many Government financed programs of no use that are relics of a bygone era. I believe completely in the statement of Abraham Lincoln that it is the duty of the Federal Government to take care of those people who cannot take care of themselves, but we have gone past that point. What these expenditures are, in total, I cannot tell you. But what all of this means is that we have to go to people and tell them that the way they live may change.

The wage earner, the wealthy, the middle class, the retired people, and particularly the people living on the wages of others have to know that everyone is going to have to make a change in life. It is not going to be easy and I recognize that. It is not easy to tell someone to lower their sights and lower their way of living. But, if we do not, then we had better pray that the American people with their eternal courage will say, "Let's do what we have to do and not get this country into more trouble."

All of us could say that we will not allow this country to get into deeper trouble and that we will strive to maintain our individual pride and collective freedom. What it means, ultimately, is that the time for speeches has passed and it is now time for some courageous action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article touching on this subject, written by Robert J. Samuelson.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REAL STORY ABOUT 1985

(By Robert J. Samuelson)

The new year is only a few weeks old, but there's already a good candidate for the most overplayed story of 1985. "Arts Agency Faces 11.7% Budget Cut," read The New York Times page one headline on Jan. 15. "Support for Opera, Music and Dance Would Decline Most Under '86 Reagan Plan."

Someone at the Times thinks the nation would suffer grievously if art subsidies were cut. I think the story important, but for a different reason: It symbolizes the mentality that has given us big budget deficits. We have overused government to support almost anything that seemed worthy.

Balancing the budget isn't so difficult, as I will show. But I don't think we'll make much headway unless we confront the root cause of the problem: a confusion over the role of government. We should focus on the larger issues of government's proper responsibilities and citizens' obligation to pay for necessary government. Instead, the budget debates dissolve into dizzying detail and exaggerate the turmoil threatened by any realistic effort to reduce the deficits.

Should the national government pay for local opera? No way. In the American tradition, government is—or ought to be—about society's collective needs. Its vast powers shouldn't be dissipated into secondary activities that, however desirable they seem, serve little public purpose. If you ask what those purposes are, I'd list four: national security; activities that benefit society as a whole but may not be done privately (for example, environmental regulation); protecting those most vulnerable to private markets—the unemployed, disabled, poor and elderly; and doing these things in a way that promotes prosperity.

Opera doesn't qualify. It's a form of entertainment and expression not unlike, say, rodeo. There's no more public purpose in subsidizing opera singers than rodeo riders. But opera subsidies are a metaphor for the condition of government. It supports everything from dairy farmers to a passenger railroad. The careless expansion of governmental powers presumed that a strong economy could bear the extra costs. We are now discovering that it can't. Large deficits raise interest rates, enlarge trade deficits and ultimately threaten the growth of living standards. In effect, we are sacrificing a stronger economy to cater to all the groups (and most of us belong to one) addicted to today's splintered government benefits.

The attachment to individual benefits also creates the false impression that disturbing them—what deficit reduction is all about—would be enormously disruptive. This isn't true. Even eliminating the deficit would not fundamentally discomfort most of us. In August, the Congressional Budget Office estimated the 1988 deficit at $238 billion. Here's how it might be closed:

Save $30 billion by eliminating programs without a compelling national need and imposing user fees on groups receiving government services below costs. Most farm programs, general revenue sharing for localities and many other subsidies (for exports, culture, Amtrak) would vanish. Plane and boat owners, truckers and users of federal irrigation would pay higher fees.

Freeze for a year cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security and most other government retirement and transfer programs, saving $12 billion in 1988.

Require most Medicare recipients (the poor might be excluded) to pay slightly more of their health costs. Along with some limits on hospital and doctor fees, this would save $8 billion.

Impose a 25-cent-a-gallon oil tax, raising about $50 billion. Because oil prices have been dropping, the tax wouldn't raise "real

Together, these measures would cut the deficit $100 billion in 1988, generating interest-rate savings because the government would borrow less. Those savings would total between $17 billion and, if interest rates dropped 2 percentage points, $40 billion. Further cuts would properly have to come from defense or higher income taxes. National security is government's first responsibility. If the Reagan buildup is wasteful, then it can be cut. If not, it needs to be paid for through taxes. Holding the "real" growth of military spending to 3 percent annually—the administration wants about 6 percent—would require roughly a $60 billion increase in personal and corporate income taxes in 1988 (about an 11 percent rise) to balance the budget.

This is reform, not revolution. An 11 percent income-tax increase is painful, not oppressive. A one-year freeze of Social Security is a trimming, not a gutting. The elderly's economic position has improved; they can bear a tad more of government's burden. An oil tax is something the government should do anyway to prevent falling oil prices from increasing our consumption and dependency on insecure imports. What about programs that get axed? Mostly, they pay for private or local benefits. Will the nation be worse off without Amtrak? Assuredly not. However, Amtrak passengers may be worse off. Instead of being subsidized, they will have to travel by car, bus or plane.

What frustrates change is a bias in our system favoring small, organized interests over the general national interest. They lobby for their programs and tax preferences because they receive the full benefits. By contrast, almost no one lobbies for measures that benefit the nation as a whole because the benefits are dispersed. Take the dairy program. The government pays dairy farmers to produce milk no one wants. There's no public purpose, but eliminating it would bankrupt some dairy farmers. So dairy groups lobby for it, Congress is sympathetic, and the program survives.

"Special interests" are often powerful because they are not evil interests. Dairy farmers are decent people who have become dependent on federal benefits, whose withdrawal would cause genuine harm. There may be a case for softening the transition, but instead we often maintain an unjustifiable benefit. And we all ultimately pay in the loss to the economy's overall strength. Government is about society's collective needs, and no one doubts our collective interest in general prosperity. What is at issue is our ability to endure immediate and modest inconvenience for larger, but deferred, gains. That's 1985's real story.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for being cooperative.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, we, in turn, thank the Senator from Arizona. It would be well to heed him, because he is indeed one of the deans of this body; and the message that he gave us in 1964 is perhaps more clearly heard in 1985. We will see what happens.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO BUY ELECTIONS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a leading constitutional scholar, Prof. Ray Forrester, professor of constitutional law at Hastings College of the Law, San Francisco, and former dean of the law schools of Tulane, Cornell, and Vanderbilt, has criticized the present status of campaign law as "the new constitutional right to buy elections." Professor Forrester has argued persuasively that Congress must enact stronger campaign spending limits and work to overturn the 1976 U.S. Supreme Court decision in Buckley against Valeo which opened the doors for virtually unchecked independent and personal political spending.

The magnitude of growth of independent and personal political spending is becoming increasingly clear as new fundraising and spending data are made available for the 1984 Presidential and congressional elections. To mention just a few of these recent reports, there is the Washington Post article of November 7, 1984, headed "New Fund Raising Record Set," the Wall Street Journal article dated December 24, 1984, entitled "PAC Money Talks Louder Now," and the Washington Post article of January 3, 1985, which carries the headline "Congressional Candidates Were Given $104 Million by Special Interests."

Estimates of campaign spending in the 1984 elections indicate that, since Buckley was decided in January 1976, all spending in Presidential and congressional campaigns has skyrocketed from $300 million to $900 million. Political Action Committee contributions to congressional campaigns alone multiplied five times from 1976 to 1984, jumping to more than $104 million in the 1984 elections.

Mr. President, Dean Forrester believes that the dramatic change in the factual situation since 1976 offers a real opportunity for Congress acting in a carefully structured statute to cause the Supreme Court to look at the problem again and reach a different conclusion. Dean Forrester believes that the issue, as framed in Buckley, is fundamentally an issue of fact.

Pursuant to this advice, I have included in my bill, S. 59, to restrict campaign spending, a specific declaration of findings of facts supporting the conclusion of the Congress that today there is a compelling public interest in restraining spending in politics, whether independent and personal or in the form of contributions.

To paraphrase a legal memorandum prepared for me by Dean Forrester:

The point is that if the Congress makes findings of facts concerning the dangers of excessive political spending and concludes that there is a compelling governmental interest in restraining the increasing rate of spending, the Supreme Court should accept the Congressional choice of means.

As Justice Brennan said, in the case of Katzenbach against Morgan in 1966, it is enough that the Court "perceive a basis upon which Congress might predicate a judgment."

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will look at the problem of runaway campaign spending and that we will have enough concern for the free election process to control the alarming increase in American campaign spending.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the three news articles described above and the text of S. 59 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 7, 1984]

NEW FUND RAISING RECORD SET

(By George Lardner, Jr.)

House and Senate candidates raised a record $284 million as the elections entered their final stretch in mid-October, Common Cause, the self-styled citizens' lobby, reported yesterday.

Nearly 29 percent of the money, $81.9 million, came from political action committees. Two years ago, PAC receipts at the same point totaled $66.5 million, or about 28 percent.

The candidates spent $231.6 million by Oct. 17, and had $60.6 million left for the last three weeks of the campaign.

The Common Cause report said that receipts rose faster than expenditures since mid-October 1982. Fund raising for House and Senate candidates rose 19 percent over the 1982 total of $239.1 million, while spending increased 9 percent over the 1982 level of $211.9 million.

House candidates, the study showed, took considerably more money from PACs than did Senate candidates. Contributions from PACs accounted for 36.3 percent of the money raised for House contests, but 19.2 percent of the Senate war chests.

Candidates in House races, Common Cause also found, were holding onto 56 percent more cash going into the final weeks than their counterparts did in 1982. And House incumbents are holding onto most of the money, retaining $42.7 million or 91 percent of the $46.9 million in cash on hand reported as of Oct. 17.

Rep. James Jones (D-Okla.), chairman of the House Budget Committee, raised the most—$1,224,306—for a House race, and he got more of that from PACs—$585,330—than did any other House candidate.

Forty-six House candidates, all incumbents, received $200,000 or more from PACs, Common Cause said. A total of 148 incumbents, including 18 committee chairmen and party leaders, got 50 percent or more of their funds from PACs, while only 17 challengers and three open-seat candidates received that high a proportion.

In the Senate races, Rep. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.) and Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) each collected more than $1 million in PAC contributions.

Top House fund-raisers after Jones were Manhattan Borough President Andrew Stein (D-N.Y.) with $1,176,199, and Rep. Bruce Morrison (D-Conn.), $887,395.

Democrats also were the biggest spenders in House races so far, led by Stein who had paid out $1,083,782; Jones, $882,383; and Rep. Joseph Addabbo (D-N.Y.), $848,670. Stein's opponents in New York's silk stocking district, Rep. Bill Green (R), was in fourth place on the spending list with $700,993.

Total 1983-84 House fund-raising as of Oct. 17 was $159.6 million, or 10 percent more than for the comparable period in 1982. But total spending dropped by 4 percent from $127.4 million in 1982 to $121.9 million this time.

In Senate contests, fund raising and spending both went up sharply. The 65 candidates for the Senate collected $124.3 million, or 32 percent more than in 1982, through Oct. 17, and they had spent $109.7 million, a 34 percent increase.

The top Senate fund-raiser in 1982 was Sen. Pete Wilson (R-Calif.) with $7.2 million. Four Senate candidates already have topped that—Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), with $14.4 million; Gov. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), $9.4 million; North Carolina Gov. James B. Hunt Jr., $8.6 million; and Gramm, $7.9 millon.

By mid-October, the same four men also had surpassed the 1982 spending record of $7.17 million set by Minnesota Democratic candidate Mark Dayton.

Spending in the Hunt-Helms race in North Carolina, by far the most expensive congressional contest in history, totaled $21.7 million. The Texas battle between Gramm and state Sen. Lloyd Doggett (D-Tex.), was next, costing $12 million. The West Virginia race between Rockefeller and John Raese (R) ranked third with more than $10 million in expenditures, and all but $765,425 of that was Rockefeller's money.

TROUBLE FOR TAX, BUDGET BILLS—PAC MONEY TALKS LOUDER NOW

(By Brooks Jackson)

WASHINGTON—New figures show money from political action committees is talking more loudly than ever in the newly elected Congress, a factor that will work against enacting a simpler tax system or controlling the federal government's red ink.

A computer-aided tabulation of the latest campaign-finance reports shows that 44% of the contributions raised by this year's winning House candidates came from PACs. The figure is a record and reflects a remarkably sharp increase from the last election when 35% of the winners' receipts came from special-interest groups.

This year's Senate winners got 23% of their contributions from PACs, compared with 22% of receipts two years ago and 14% in 1978, the last time the same Senate seats were contested.

Final, official figures won't be published by the Federal Election Commission for about a year and may differ somewhat from this first, unofficial tally. But it is clear that many powerful PACs continued to grow in this latest election year and that lawmakers have become even more reliant on them for campaign funds.

CONTRIBUTORS MAY BE HURT

The result, some predict, could well be legislative gridlock on the crucial issues of taxation and budget.

"The tax bill is most likely going no place, and the reason is that all the groups that benefit from the current system are all big contributors," says Jay Angoff, staff attorney for Congress Watch, a group founded by consumer-activist Ralph Nader. Oddly, the Naderites find themselves strongly in favor of the tax-simplification package proposed by President Reagan's Treasury Department, which calls for, among broader changes, reducing tax deductions for business lunches and country-club dues.

Mr. Angoff has a point. The Treasury's tax plan would restrict a number of tax benefits to the real estate industry, including mortgage-interest deductions for second homes and the use by state and local governments of tax-exempt securities to finance low-rate mortgages for apartments and single-family homes. But none of these are viewed with much favor by the National Association of Realtors or the National Association of Home Builders, two groups with huge PACs. Together, they dispensed more than $4.3 million to federal candidates in last month's election.

The Treasury plan to achieve a lower overall tax rate would also begin taxing such fringe benefits as employer-paid health insurance. This of course is opposed by labor unions, which control some of the largest PACs. The United Auto Workers union and the Machinists union, for example, each gave more than $1.5 million through their PACs in the 1984 election.

Groups with big PACs defend not only their pet tax provisions but their favorite federal spending programs as well. The American Medical Association, for example, is gearing up to fight Reagan administration proposals to slice into federal spending for child and maternal health, immunization programs, Medicare and Medicaid.

ENOUGH IS ENOUGH

"Enough is enough," said the AMA's president, Joseph F. Boyle, at the group's annual convention in Hawaii earlier this month. "We are the protectors of the public health. We must not stand impotently by."

The AMA is hardly impotent. Its PAC gave more than $2 million.

Other proposed spending cuts will be fought by public-employee unions, which run some of the biggest and fastest-growing PACs. The Letter Carriers union, for example, is keenly opposed to cutting civil-service retirement benefits or other costly fringe benefits for postal workers. The union's PAC nearly quadrupled its donations in the recent election to just under $1.5 million.

Also fighting domestic spending cuts is the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, whose two PACs increased combined donations by 59% to $1.1 million from the 1982 election. "Every time President Reagan cuts a program, he's cutting a program implemented by our people," says the union's director of political action, Jerry Clark.

Overall, PACs increased donations to congressional candidates by at least 23% to $103 million. The total could go higher when December gifts are tallied. About three-quarters of the money went to winners.

LARGER GIFTS EXPECTED

The growth is likely to continue, although at somewhat slower than the 40% jumps recorded between past elections.

PAC directors say this just shows that more and more citizens are giving political donations collectively, through the committees. But the trend worries Fred Wertheimer, president of Common Cause, an anti-PAC group. "It means that the new Congress comes in more in debt and more dependent on PACs than they ever have been," he says. "It's going to make it that much harder to achieve consensus on public-policy questions."

A proponent of PACs, Richard Armstrong, president of the Public Affairs Council, disagrees but only to a point. "I do see a gridlock," he says, but "I don't see the PACs playing a very large role in it."

Still, Mr. Armstrong sees at least one area where PAC money is likely to cause congressional inaction: campaign-financing legislation.

"The chances of any kind of reform legislation (on campaign financing) in the next year or two are almost nil," he says. "If all that money is going to incumbents, why should they complain?"

CONGRESSIONAL CANDIDATES WERE GIVEN $104 MILLION BY SPECIAL INTERESTS—HOUSE DEMOCRATS AMONG LEADING PAC BENEFICIARIES

(By Dan Balz)

Political action committees gave a record $104 million to congressional candidates in the 1984 elections, with House Democrats among the leading beneficiaries, according to a report released yesterday.

Incumbents fared better than ever, receiving 73 percent of the PAC money. That compares with 66 percent that was funneled to incumbents during the 1982 campaigns and 61 percent in 1980.

Total PAC contributions rose by 25 percent in the 1983-84 cycle, according to the study by Public Citizen's Congress Watch, a Ralph Nader organization.

In the 1981-82 cycle, PACs gave $83.6 million.

Democrats continued to increase their share of the special-interest money, collecting 58 percent during the 1984 campaign, compared to 54 percent two years ago and 52 percent four years ago.

The increased role of special-interest money in financing congressional campaigns was most evident in the number of House and Senate candidates who received substantial PAC contributions.

Two Senate candidates—Rep. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.) and Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.)—received more than $1 million apiece from PACs. Gramm won his Senate race, while Percy was defeated by Rep. Paul Simon (D-Ill.).

Eleven other Senate candidates received more than $800,000 in PAC funds. In the 1979-80 election cycle, no Senate candidate received more than $800,000.

In the House, 95 candidates received more than $200,000 in special-interest money, led by Rep. James R. Jones (D-Okla.), with $694,212. In the 1980 elections, only four House candidates received more than $200,000, while two years ago 30 candidates received that much.

Of the top 25 PAC recipients in the House, 21 were Democrats, the study found. After Jones, the leading PAC beneficiaries in the House were Reps. Jerry M. Patterson (D-Calif.) with $435,875, Gerry E. Sikorski (D-Minn.) with $419,147, Bruce A. Morrison (D-Conn.) with $407,779, and Les AuCoin (D-Ore.) with $400,766.

Patterson was defeated for reelection by former House member Robert K. Dornan (R-Calif.). Morrison and Sikorski, freshman Democrats thought to be in difficult races, both won reelection.

House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.) was the leading Republican PAC recipient, with $388,329. Second was Rep. Jack Fields (R-Tex.), with $361,342.

The Congress Watch study also found that 12 House incumbents with little or no opposition received more than $200,000 from PACs. Of the 12, eight are on the House Ways and Means Committee, where tax legislation originates.

Tops among this group was Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), the Ways and Means chairman, with $295,505, followed by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), $245,660.

The National Association of Realtors and the American Medical Association both gave more than $2 million to congressional candidates.

S. 59

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Election Campaign Expenditure Limits Act".

FINDINGS AND DECLARATIONS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) campaign spending by congressional candidates directly increased to an estimated $400,000,000 in 1983-1984, more than triple the $125,500,000 spent in the 1976 elections, the period of the United States Supreme Court decision in Buckley against Valeo;

(2) campaign spending by all sources in Presidential elections increased from $160,000,000 in 1976 to an estimated $325,000,000 in 1984, a rise of more than double;

(3) political action committee contributions to congressional campaigns increased from $22,600,000 in the 1976 elections to more than $104,000,000 in the 1984 elections, almost five times the earlier amount;

(4) independent campaign spending by political action committees and other associations and individuals, to influence election results in Federal campaigns amounted to more than $17,000,000 in the 1984 elections;

(5) total spending by political action committees at the Federal level rose from $53,000,000 in the 1976 elections to an estimated $270,000,000 in the 1984 elections, a rise exceeding 500 per centum;

(6) all campaign spending in the 1984 Presidential and congressional elections totaled $900,000,000 compared with a total of $300,000,000 spent in 1976, triple the earlier amount;

(7) the sharp increase in the amount and nature of excessive campaign spending in Federal elections poses a danger of real or perceived corruption among candidates for Federal offices and elected Federal officials and thereby discourages and reduces full voting participation by all citizens in Federal elections;

(8) the burden on elected Federal officials of soliciting campaign funds and attending or participating in campaign fundraising activities interferes with and adversely affects the performance of their official duties;

(9) the ability of candidates, parties, and individuals or independent associations and committees to communicate their political expressions and views is not dependent on making unlimited expenditures for political advertising, direct mail appeals, polls, and other political services;

(10) the establishment of limitations on total campaign spending in Federal elections by candidates, parties, individuals or independent associations, which allow a reasonable amount and diversity of political expenditures, will not unduly restrain the quantity and diversity of political expression and speech;

(11) excessive campaign expenditures endanger the integrity and stability of the election process and the successful functioning of self-rule by the people under the Constitution;

(12) the interest of political expression must be balanced against other compelling and legitimate governmental interests; and

(13)(A) it is therefore necessary and proper to enact comprehensive campaign spending limitations in Federal elections and to limit the length of Presidential campaigns in order to accomplish the compelling interests of Congress in—

(i) securing the stability of the political system;

(ii) furthering the full participation of all voting age citizens in Federal elections;

(iii) protecting against corruption in the political system;

(iv) furthering the effective performance of their duties by elected Federal officials; and

(v) carrying out its duty to "secure the blessings of liberty" to the people; and

(B) there is no alternative which will adequately accomplish these purposes.

1984 WAS SUCH A GREAT YEAR THANKS TO THE DEFICIT—WHY CUT IT?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the administration and the supply siders have been bubbling over like high school cheerleaders whose team has just come from behind to win the upset victory of the year. Why all the joy and jubilation? There is good reason.

The economic figures are out now on 1984. Are they good? They are better than good. They are terrific. Consider: Our country had the best growth year since 1951, 33 years ago, a remarkable 6.8 percent after—that is right, after—inflation. And with this superb growth performance, the American economy increased the number of jobs to a record all-time high. Real personal income after inflation broke all records. But what really put the blissful icing on the cake was the amazing fact that the United States enjoyed all this exuberant prosperity with a continued moderate inflation.

What a great record for inflation in the past 3 years. Keep in mind that inflation in 1980 exceeded 12 percent. By 1982, it was down to only 3.9 percent. In 1983, it stayed at 3.8 percent. Last year, 1984, it came in at about the same level—4 percent. Think of what that means. Inflation in 1982 plus inflation in 1983 plus inflation in 1984 was less—less in those 3 years all together than in the single year 1980.

So why should not the President crow over this record? Many of us, including this Senator, had said over and over again that the policies of this administration were taking the country over the cliff into a disastrous crash. Were we wrong? After all, here we have a record overall growth, continued low inflation, more jobs than ever, higher profits, and the United States has served as the economic locomotive pulling the rest of the free world out of a worldwide recession into better times.

So we not only have the best record that we have had in 33 years but we are the only country of all the free world that is doing this well.

That sounds as if those of us who criticized the administration were not just wrong but abysmally wrong.

Should we feel absolutely humiliated? Should we slink off and hang our heads in the corner? Maybe we should. But then again, maybe we should not.

Here is why maybe we should. For whatever reason, the Reagan-Kemp-Novak supply side nostrum worked. It worked. And in this pragmatic country we judge policy on the basis of performance.

And what a performance. And why should we not judge by results, especially in economic matters? What other criteria are there? After all, there is no policy in economics that does not have its high priests. Nobel prize-winning economists are all over the place with what we ought to do. Also, there are Harvard University sages, Wall Street gurus, widely venerated pros like Leonard Silk of the New York Times and Louis Rukeyser of Wall Street Week. You can find an expert for every kind of practice any public official pursues. So how can we judge a policy except by the results?

And not only does Reaganomics seem to work like a happy dream, it is political magic. We have the proof. The people of this democracy want it. Here is a President who has just been reelected by a record smashing landslide. And on what issue? Well, the issue was obviously the economy. It was even more specific. The issue was the policies that caused the biggest deficits in the history of this Republic. And the people voted for the deficits. Oh, sure, they said they do not like deficits. But they also said, as specifically as an electorate ever said anything, "no new taxes." They said they wanted spending cut. But they wanted spending cut without cutting the major programs. They did not want Social Security reduced. Oh, yes, they wanted to hold down military spending, but they also wanted a stronger military force. Of course, they wanted the Government to continue to pay interest on the exploding national debt, and they wanted more for education, more for the environment, more to fight crime. So sure they wanted us to cut the deficit, provided we did not go too far and really reduce resources for major spending programs. And especially and above all they did not want us to raise taxes.

So they sort of, kind of, maybe wanted the deficit cut, but they wanted the cut without pain and they sure liked what the deficit did. Many Americans may not fully understand it. But the deficit is what has given us these remarkable good times. The deficit did it. The deficit did it. Without the deficit there is no way 1984 could have been such a sensationally good year economically. Doubt it? Then consider we have had 3 successive years of back-to-back megadeficits. In 1982 we broke all the records with an unprecedented $109 billion monster. In 1983 the deficit made that look like kid stuff when the Federal Government spent $195 billion more than it took in. And last year it was almost as bad at $175 billion. Now, I do not think there is any economist anywhere who would not tell you that deficits of this size will stimulate the economy and result in rapid economic growth. So did the deficits cause the record-smashing growth of 1984? Of course they did.

Did the deficits also increase the number of jobs to an all-time high? Indeed, they did, just as the deficits increased the profits of American corporations. Did the deficits pull the rest of the world out of recession? Sure they did.

But now wait a minute. Do you say the remarkable development in the past 3 years is not economic growth? Of course, the deficits did that. The remarkable development was the accompanying drop in inflation and its stabilization at around 4 percent a year, an astonishing one-third of the level it had reached in 1980. A deficit can stimulate growth, but how can it slow down the rise in prices that increased demand and surging prosperity usually brings? Well, the deficit—this exploding, record, irresponsible deficit did reduce inflation and then hold it down? You do not believe it? Well, here is how it worked:

The deficit required immense borrowing both by our Federal Government to fund the deficit and the private sector to finance the recovery. That borrowing attracted capital from all over the world. The Japanese sold their yen and bought the dollar so they could take advantage of the relatively high interest rates and low risk securities in America. The English sold the pound and bought the dollar. The Germans the mark. The Italians the lira. The French sold the franc and bought dollars. So the dollar became more and more bloated. It is now at an all time high. What does this have to do with low American inflation? Well, the answer is everything. The yen dropped about 25 percent compared to the dollar that cut the price of Japanese cars and TV sets by 25 percent.

In Europe Common Market currencies fell more than 40 percent, so the price of German steel, English textiles, French wine, and many other products fell through the floor for American consumers. Even more important, Mr. President, even more important American business could not compete with cheaper foreign imports unless it too held down prices. So why can the President take bows for the low level of inflation as well as the happy surge in economic growth? Because the low level of inflation is the happy product of the massive deficit caused by the administration's and Congress' policies. The next time you or I feel inclined to knock the deficit keep in mind like all major policies the consequences of these deficits are varied. They have given this country a very sweet recovery.

Should we then forget all this theoretical folderol about the deficit as a scourge that we must seek out and destroy?

The distinguished Senator from Arizona earlier today spoke so eloquently about should we relax and enjoy this happy and oh so rare combination of booming growth and relatively stable prices.

Should we tell the mournful ideologues the sobbing sisters of sorrows who warn us of the evil day to get lost? Should we really get practical and continue on this path of triumph until we stumble into visible trouble and then, only then change it and only if and when trouble comes? We know it is not here yet. Maybe it will never come.

The answer is we absolutely should not do that. That deficit is sure, lead-pipe certain to shove us into very deep trouble indeed. We are like a family that is living it up on its credit card, having a great time while it sinks into perpetual debt. What a great time you can have on this old credit card. You can fly to Hawaii. You can go to Las Vegas. You can buy a car. You can have all kinds of joy and pleasure and forget about tomorrow.

Every day we are building a bigger and bigger, an exploding national debt. Unless we change this deficit policy, service cost, that is paying interest on the national debt, will become the biggest single cost of Government.

We will rivet ourselves into perpetually high interest rates.

Let me say something about solving the national debt. I can see myself—I have a 6-year-old grandson and a 4-year-old grandson. I can see them saying, "Granddad, you were a Senator back in 1985. Why in the world did you follow such a benighted, stupid, ridiculous policy that is imposing on us a cost of servicing that debt that you increased that is bigger than any other expense we have?" I predict unless we act on this, that is going to be the biggest expense and one we cannot cut, we cannot postpone. We cannot freeze; we are going to have to pay.

But we will also rivet ourselves into perpetually high interest rates and, of course, that will devastate the homebuilding industry, the automobile industry, and all the other interest-sensitive industries.

Judging by the absolutely consistent experience of all other countries who have fallen deeply into debt, we will suffer a huge inflation.

Mr. President, if I have done nothing else in this speech, I hope I have helped my colleagues who may read it to understand how extraordinarily difficult it will be for us to pull ourselves out of this sinking quicksand of debt.

Think what we have to do. We have to turn our backs on the kind of stimulus that brought us economic growth with all its other jobs and moderate inflation, too. And let us face it. As we reduce these deficits we can very likely expect a slowdown in economic growth, perhaps a severe slowdown, combined with more inflation. What a formula for losing an election.

Like a family that decides it must begin to reduce its borrowing and pay off its debt, we are going to have to make some very painful sacrifices. It will mean more unemployment, a reduced standard of living, higher prices, less, much less in Government services, and higher taxes. Will Congress have the courage to persist year after year for all the years it will take to achieve this agonizing trip to a healthy fiscal policy and a sound economy? More fundamentally, will the American people elect Congresses and Presidents in the future who are willing to assume this kind of fiscal puritanism?

You know, that great Baltimore sage, H.L. Mencken, defined puritanism as the haunting fear that somewhere someone is happy.

Well, that is the kind of puritanism it will take to bring this grossly irresponsible fiscal policy under control and keep it under control.

THE PAY-AS-YOU-GO BUDGET ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation to require that the Federal budget be put on a pay-as-you-go basis. This bill exempts trust funds—Social Security, Medicare are examples—which now pay for themselves from this requirement.

What it does is provide that in the future whatever program the Congress adopts we will have to also pass taxes to pay for that program. We have not done that in the past. This legislation has been considered very seriously in the House of Representatives and I think we should consider it here in the Senate. I am hopeful that we can enact this legislation.

Pay-as-you-go is a simple concept. If Congress decides to increase spending for a particular program, this bill requires that we either cut some other program or raise taxes. And if we want to take the always popular course and cut taxes, then we must make an equal cut in spending.

Over a period of 4 or 5 years, this bill will result in a balanced budget. Revenues generated by economic growth will not be frittered away on additional spending—they will be used to balance the budget. After we reach that happy condition, the bill provides that the budget resolution shall specify how additional revenues are to be used.

Mr. President, why is this legislation needed? Over the last two or three decades, Congress and the administration have not applied any rule to the Federal budget. As a result, we face staggering deficits as far as the eye can see.

Up until the early sixties, the Federal Government operated as though a balanced budget was always a desirable goal. True, we might not balance the budget but not doing so was widely considered a failure. Even during the midst of the Great Depression, President Roosevelt was chagrined to discover that he would be unable to balance the budget.

But that same depression mortally wounded the powerful but unwritten balanced budget rule. Economists—led by John Maynard Keynes—speculated that a balanced budget during an economic downturn was economic poison. Instead of trying to balance the budget, the Federal Government should be trying to stimulate the economy by spending more or taxing less.

The Federal Government fell head over heels in love with this theory. Speaking as a Member of Congress for over 27 years, I can testify that most of us enjoy appropriating money for our favorite programs or cutting our constituents' taxes. This theory offered us a rationale for doing both.

Deficits bloomed during economic downturns as we tried to stimulate the economy. But they also bloomed during good times when the theory called for budget surpluses. The result—an economy plagued by inflation, low productivity, and growing unemployment.

Now many economists are beginning to question the usefulness of deficits even during a downturn. If businessmen, labor leaders, and investors expect the Federal Government to run a deficit, and inflationary expectations are aroused much of the stimulative effect of a deficit can be lost. In addition, as international influences play a larger role in national economics the stimulative effect of a deficit can be drained by something as uncontrollable as a change in the value of a national currency. These two factors suggest that managing our economy is far more difficult than we had thought.

Clearly, we need a new approach to fiscal policy. And if we have learned anything over the past two decades it is that gimmicks do not work. At first, they may appear to resolve a problem but, sooner or later they fail and we are faced with a more difficult situation than when we resorted to the gimmick.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, the purpose of fiscal policy should be to encourage long-term, balanced economic growth. Efforts to fine tune the economy are doomed to fail.

That is why a pay-as-you-go budget is now particularly appropriate. It is politically feasible—if we want to spend more money on a specific program, we should raise the money to pay for it. That is an approach the American people can understand and approve.

Furthermore, it is an approach which is prudent from an economic viewpoint. We are now in an expansion but one imperiled by staggering deficits. This bill will reduce those deficits. When Keynesian economics was triumphant, we used to hope that economic growth would pay for new programs. That did not work as our fervor for new programs overwhelmed the economy's ability to generate new revenue. This bill suggests a more humble approach—use this additional revenue to balance the budget while requiring us to pay for new programs.

This bill contains a wrinkle not in most pay-as-you-go legislation. It exempts from the pay-as-you-go requirement trust funds which already meet this test. The most well known of these funds are Social Security and Medicare.

Why have I exempted these funds? First, these are trust funds. We should not be using revenue raised for a specific purpose for something else. In my opinion, that is a violation of our trust responsibilities. Second, these funds are usually financed by some type of payroll or sales tax. These taxes are notably regressive, meaning that they hit lower and middle-income people harder. We should not place the burden of paying for new programs wholly on the shoulders of these taxpayers.

Mr. President, I believe the time is right for a reform of fiscal policy. A pay-as-you-go approach is the right reform to make. Let us act now while we have the opportunity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 291

NEW YORK ASSOCIATION FOR NEW AMERICANS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, for years I have risen before this body to discuss the horrors of genocide and the importance of ratifying the Genocide Convention. I have spoken about numerous human rights violations occurring in countries throughout the world including China, Uganda, Cambodia, Indonesia, and the Soviet Union. I have often reported morbid accounts of torture and suffering and related them to the most barbarous crime of all, genocide.

We must not forget the pain and suffering that occurs in the world. It is a constant reminder of the need to denounce human rights violations and to take a stand against genocide.

Today, however, I would like to mention some positive actions taken in response to world oppression. For 35 years the New York Association for New Americans [NYANA] has been assisting refugees as they resettled in America. Founded in 1949, NYANA originally assisted Jewish refugees affected by the Holocaust.

In its first 2 years of existence NYANA helped to resettle 38,000 individuals. Since that time it has assisted 13 successive waves of immigrants. Refugees from Greece, Hungary, Egypt, Romania, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and most recently Syria, Iran, and Indochina, have all benefitted from NYANA's various programs.

For 35 years NYANA has courageously dealt with the tragic consequences of oppression and genocide.

The organization has lived with the pain and suffering of human beings as they fled from the forces of evil. It has assisted people who have lost family and friends to murderous regimes. It has witnessed tragedy and sorrow, but also triumph and hope. Above all, however, the people of NYANA have witnessed courage, the courage of people dealing with the most abhorrent of circumstances. NYANA has experienced genocide.

Many of us feel ambivalent to atrocities that occur in far away lands, to groups of people different from ourselves. NYANA has illustrated the common bond we all share. They have assisted diverse groups of people with seemingly one thing in common. Through this one shared circumstance however, many similarities have appeared. It is time we acted on behalf of our fellow human beings wherever they are from. They need our support. Let us act and provide it. Let us ratify the Genocide Convention.

NUCLEAR TEST BAN SHOULD COME FROM TALKS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should challenge the Soviet Union to a nuclear testing moratorium so both sides can negotiate a comprehensive test ban treaty.

As we all know, Mr. President, Secretary of State Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko are presently engaged in umbrella arms control talks in Geneva. We all hope and pray that these talks are successful, for the sake of all mankind.

Mr. President, a halt to all testing of nuclear warheads is probably one agreement we could probably achieve fairly quickly and easily. And to get those negotiations out of the starting block, this resolution proposes challenging the Soviets to a testing moratorium, just as John F. Kennedy did more than two decades ago.

Twenty years ago, relations between the United States and the Soviet Union were in bad shape. The United States had just come out of the Cuban missile crisis, during which the superpowers edged as close as they ever have to nuclear war.

But on June 10, 1963, John Kennedy decided to break the ice.

On June 10, Kennedy challenged the Soviets to a test ban and announced that the United States would suspend nuclear testing in the atmosphere as long as other countries halted testing.

What happened as a result of Kennedy's challenge?

Two months later, the United States and the Soviet Union signed the Limited Test Ban Treaty.

Kennedy took a bold step 20 years ago. Today, we should take that same kind of bold step.

Today, as we hopefully make a fresh start in arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union, let's not forget that one of the most important treaties we could conclude with the Soviet Union would be a comprehensive test ban treaty, a CTB Treaty.

It would also be a treaty we could probably negotiate in the quickest amount of time.

All the hard bargaining on a CTB has been done by previous administrations.

If the President requested Senate ratification of the 1974 Threshold Test Ban Treaty and the 1976 Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, he would have the verification mechanisms in place, which would make a comprehensive test ban easier to monitor and implement.

Mr. President, this resolution is similar to the one I introduced in the last Congress. It calls on the President to seek a 6-month moratorium with the Soviet Union on nuclear warhead testing.

I stress that this would have to be a mutual moratorium. Both sides would have to halt testing or the deal is off.

And this moratorium would have to be verifiable. The United States already has the capability to detect any militarily significant testing by the Soviets during the 6-month moratorium.

During those 6 months, United States and Soviet negotiators would sit down and put the finishing touches on a comprehensive test ban treaty.

The resolution also calls on the President to request Senate ratification of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, which have provisions that would make verification of a comprehensive test ban easier.

As I have said, this would be a bold step for the United States to take.

The Soviets might turn us down. Or they might stall us in the negotiations. We know that bargaining with them is no picnic.

But if ever the time was right to try, it is now.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the concurrent resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 7

Whereas the nuclear arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union is getting dangerously out of control;

Whereas a comprehensive ban on the testing of nuclear warheads would be an important first step in achieving a verifiable United States-Soviet freeze on the nuclear arms race;

Whereas every American President from Dwight Eisenhower on has supported negotiations toward a comprehensive test ban;

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union pledged in the Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963 "to achieve the discontinuance of all test explosions of nuclear weapons for all time";

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union pledged in the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 to "continue their negotiations with a view toward achieving a solution to the problem of the cessation of all underground nuclear weapon tests";

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union pledged in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1968 to "pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date" and a comprehensive nuclear test ban would aid efforts to halt the spread of nuclear weapons;

Whereas the United States signed the Threshold Test Ban Treaty in 1974 and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty in 1976, but has yet to ratify these important treaties;

Whereas ratification of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty would greatly aid in the negotiation, verification, and implementation of a comprehensive nuclear test ban;

Whereas President Kennedy on June 10, 1963 challenged the Soviet Union to a test ban and announced a United States moratorium on nuclear tests, and on August 5, 1963 the United States and the Soviet Union signed the Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty;

Whereas substantial progress has already been made in previous negotiations toward a comprehensive nuclear test ban so that the conclusion of such a treaty could be quickly achieved;

Whereas a bold initiative is now needed by the United States to achieve a mutual and verifiable halt to the testing of nuclear warheads; and

Whereas a six-month United States-Soviet moratorium on the testing of nuclear warheads would provide the United States and the Soviet Union an opportunity to negotiate a comprehensive nuclear test ban and would aid those negotiations: Now, therefore, be it,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President should—

(1) immediately seek a six-month verifiable moratorium with the Government of the Soviet Union on the testing of nuclear explosive devices;

(2) utilize the six-month moratorium period to negotiate a verifiable comprehensive nuclear test ban with the Government of the Soviet Union; and

(3) request the advice and consent of the Senate to the ratification of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974 and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty of 1976 in order to aid in the negotiation, verification, and implementation of a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President.

WILLIAM J. BENNETT FOR SECRETARY OF EDUCATION—FINALLY A CABINET APPOINTMENT WITH RELEVANT EXPERIENCE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I recently discussed here the appointment of people to four top administration jobs, none of whom had any relevant experience and simply were not qualified for their jobs. When the nominees for Secretary of the Treasury, our chief arms control negotiator, the Attorney General of the United States, and Secretary of Energy, all fail to have minimal experience and will have to get on-the-job training, the situation is serious indeed.

Because of that sad track record, I am pleased to note that in appointing William J. Bennett to be Secretary of Education, the President has found someone who has spent considerable time involved in education.

In fact, Dr. Bennett has been involved in one aspect or another of education for most of his life. He was an outstanding student who attended Williams College in Massachusetts on scholarship. He went on to earn a Ph.D. in philosophy at the University of Texas and later, a law degree at Harvard University. During the time he was working toward his law degree, Dr. Bennett served as an adviser and tutor in an undergraduate dorm.

He has taught law and philosophy at a number of outstanding universities in our Nation, including the University of Wisconsin.

From 1972 to 1976, Dr. Bennett was an assistant to the president of Boston University.

Before being appointed Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, William Bennett was president and director of the National Humanities Center in North Carolina.

Dr. Bennett has been a consultant to dozens of secondary schools on quality in curriculum development.

He has not only published numerous articles and books, but also has sought to influence the general public's outlook on education by writing articles in a number of popular magazines and leading newspapers.

I certainly do not agree with every decision taken by Dr. Bennett as Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities. For example, I do not share his views regarding the limiting of affirmative action plans for the hiring of women and members of minority groups. But I fully respect him as a thoughtful and dedicated advocate of quality education in our Nation.

I applaud his promoting tougher standards for teachers and students, and greater discipline in our Nation's schools. I support his strong advocacy of more intellectual rigor in our colleges and universities, and his strong emphasis on the notion that a well-educated person must study philosophy, literature, and history.

Clearly, William J. Bennett is an experienced voice for reason and excellence in education and, based upon what I now know of his record, I intend to vote to confirm him as Secretary of Education.

The President has nominated a man who is well qualified to be Secretary of Education. The President deserves credit for making the nomination and I hope that Mr. Bennett will be unanimously confirmed. He certainly deserves it. He has exactly the right kind of qualifications and background.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR METZENBAUM

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Ohio is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I expect to share this time with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, Senator GORE. It is my understanding that he is on his way over. In the interest of time, I will make some remarks in which he and I join.

THE INFANT FORMULA ACT

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, almost 5 years ago, I watched President Carter sign into law the Infant Formula Act of 1980. Also present that day were many childen—beautiful little children who had suffered illness because, as infants, they were fed defective formula. Some of those children have physical and mental disabilities that will follow them throughout life.

The Senator from Tennessee, the original author of the act, who introduced and guided to passage the House version of the bill, and I pushed this legislation for one simple reason—to ensure that never again would defective formula be sold in America. By instituting strong quality control measures over the production of formula, we hoped that never again would we face a situation like that we experienced in 1979—a massive recall of all infant formula produced by the Syntex Corp., a leading producer of formula at that time.

In this case, Mr. President, Syntex decided to stop including chloride as one of the ingredients in their formula. Syntex did not bother to ask how the new mixture would affect babies. In fact, for many months the company did not bother to print new labels that reflected the change. And as a result, no one knew that the formula lacked a life-sustaining nutrient.

What happened?

Before the defective formula was finally recalled, some 20,000 babies were exposed to it. Many became ill, but recovered, others were permanently damaged. Some infants died.

I think that virtually everyone in and out of the industry would agree that Syntex was guilty at the very least of negligence—everyone, that is, except the Justice Department.

In spite of overwhelming evidence that the company was in violation of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act, Justice refused to act.

Why?

Because, Justice said, punishing Syntex would not benefit society.

Now that is truly a remarkable conclusion, and certainly a new kind of approach to the whole question of criminal law.

If it does not benefit society to punish a company whose negligence endangered the health and even the lives of 20,000 infants, then what benefit does society derive from punishing anyone?

If ever there was an outrageous decision, Mr. President, that of the Justice Department in this instance is certainly outrageous.

But at least, I thought at the time, with the Infant Formula Act of 1980 in effect, problems with unsafe formula would not occur.

I was wrong.

Since passage of the Infant Formula Act of 1980, 3 million cans of formula have been recalled.

The reason?

Shortly after the FDA had finished writing tough regulations to implement the act, the election of 1980 ushered in a new administration—and one of the first initiatives of the Reagan FDA was to scrap those regulations.

And it was not until 2 weeks ago—after 4 full years in office—that they finally published labeling regulations.

On quality control, the Reagan FDA was a bit prompter—it took them only 2 years to write those. And instead of establishing detailed quality control procedures, the rule simply permitted each manufacturer to use whatever quality control system is best suited to its needs. How absurd. How unbelievable to permit the manufacturer to use whatever quality control system is best suited to its needs, and particularly in view of the fact that this Congress has made its views clear on the subject.

What has been the result?

In one case, a manufacturer was in possession of laboratory results confirming that its product was defective. The formula was released anyway. In fact, FDA itself knew this formula was bad 2 months before it was finally recalled.

I say to Members of the Senate, we are talking about little children, infants, hardly born infants, who take into their bodies the formula that they think is right, proper, and that there is quality control, and then too many of them have been deformed or have been mentally harmed by reason of the ingestion of that product.

When Senator GORE and I introduced the Infant Formula Act, we were concerned not with the needs of the infant formula industry, but with the health and well-being of our Nation's infants.

Senator GORE provided this Nation with distinguished leadership when, as a Member of the House, he authored and proposed the bill which eventually became the law.

As the original sponsors of that legislation, we are here today to state emphatically that the intent of Congress in this matter has clearly been ignored by the FDA.

We are, therefore, today introducing a measure which will provide the protections that were meant to be part of the Infant Formula Act 5 years ago. The provisions of the Infant Formula Amendments of 1985 include establishing a uniform quality control system, scheduling regular tests of infant formula products both prior to and thoughout their shelf lives, requiring strict record keeping by the manufacturer, and establishing an application process that must be successfully completed prior to marketing of a new infant formula. In addition, the bill establishes guidelines with regard to the recall of defective formula.

Mr. President, I cannot adequately stress to my colleagues the importance of this legislation. Commercially prepared infant formulas are the sole source of nourishment for babies who cannot digest cows' milk or whose mothers cannot, or choose not to, breast feed them.

Children who are fed nutritionally defective formula run the risk of suffering severe mental or physical retardation, illness, or even death. We have a duty to make certain that infant formula is both safe and nutritious before it is released for distribution.

Mr. President, the Infant Formula Act directed FDA to prescribe quality control and recordkeeping requirements for the infant formula industry. Instead, FDA issued regulations which allow manufacturers to decide for themselves what quality control procedures they will use and which records they will keep. This measure will correct that dangerous situation. I hope that my colleagues will give to this measure the support it deserves and that we can move expeditiously to pass it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 265 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 265

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 412 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsections (e), (f), and (g) as subsections (h), (i), and (j), respectively;

(2) by striking out the last sentence of paragraph (1) of subsection (h) (as redesignated by clause (1) of this section) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new sentence: "Such records shall be retained for at least one year after the expiration of the shelf life of the infant formula."; and

(3) by striking out subsections (a) through (d) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a)(1) An infant formula shall be deemed to be adulterated if—

"(A) such infant formula does not provide nutrients as required by subsection (j);

"(B) such infant formula does not meet the quality factor requirements prescribed by the Secretary under this section; or

"(C) the processing of such infant formula is not in compliance with the quality control procedures prescribed by the Secretary under this section.

"(2)(A) The Secretary shall by regulation—

"(i) establish requirements for quality factors for nutrients required by subsection (j);

"(ii) establish quality control procedures and requirements respecting the retention of records that the Secretary determines are necessary to assure that an infant formula provides nutrients in accordance with this section; and

"(iii) establish requirements for the conduct by the manufacturer of an infant formula of regularly scheduled audits to determine that such manufacturer has complied with the quality control procedures prescribed under clause (ii).

"(B) The quality control procedures prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A)(ii) shall include—

"(i) the testing of each batch of infant formula prior to the distribution of such batch; and

"(ii) regularly scheduled testing of samples of infant formulas during the shelf life of such formulas, in order to ensure that such formulas are in compliance with this section and do not contain any deleterious or otherwise unsafe substance.

"(C) The record retention requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A)(ii) shall include requirements for the retention of:

"(i) all records necessary to demonstrate compliance with the quality control procedures prescribed by the Secretary under such subparagraph, including records containing the results of all testing required by subparagraph (B);

"(ii) copies of all records prepared by or for all suppliers of raw materials and food packaging materials used in the processing of infant formula to demonstrate compliance by such suppliers with all regulations, guidelines, and action levels prescribed by the Secretary with respect to such raw materials and food packaging materials and with respect to infant formula;

"(iii) all records pertaining to the microbiological quality of raw materials used in infant formula and of finished infant formula (including infant formula powder); and

"(iv) all records of the results of regularly scheduled audits conducted pursuant to the requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A)(iii).

Records required under this paragraph with respect to an infant formula shall be retained for at least one year after the expiration of the shelf life of such infant formula. Such records shall be made available to the Secretary for review and duplication upon request of the Secretary.

"(D) In prescribing requirements for audits under subparagraph (A)(iii), the Secretary shall provide that such audits be conducted by appropriately trained individuals who do not have any direct responsibility for ensuring that the manufacturer of an infant formula complies with the quality control procedures prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A)(iii).

"(3) the Secretary may be regulation—

"(A) revise the list of nutrients in the table in subsection (1); and

"(B) revise the required level for any nutrient required by subsection (j).

"(b) No persons shall introduce or deliver for introduction into interstate commerce any new infant formula unless an application has been filed pursuant to subsection (c) with respect to such formula and such application has not been disapproved. For purposes of this section, the term 'new infant formula' includes any infant formula for which there has been a change in formulation or processing which may affect whether the formula is adulterated within the meaning of this section.

"(c) Any person may file with the Secretary an application with respect to any infant formula subject to the provisions of subsection (b). Each such application shall include—

"(1) full reports of testing demonstrating that such infant formula provides nutrients in accordance with subsection (j) and complies with the quality factor requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subsection (a)(2)(A)(i);

"(2) records demonstration that the processing of such infant formula complies with the quality control procedures prescribed by the Secretary under subsection (a)(2)(A)(ii); and

"(3) such additional information as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe.

"(d) Within ninety days after an application is filed under subsection (c), or prior to the end of such additional period as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the applicant, the Secretary shall either—

"(1) approve the application if the Secretary finds that the infant formula complies with the requirements of this section and the quality control procedures and quality factor requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subsection (a)(2)(A); or

"(2) deny the application.

"(e) An applicant whose application has been denied under subsection (d)(2) may appeal such denial pursuant to procedures specified in regulations prescribed by the Secretary. After the applicant has exhausted the remedies specified in such procedures, the applicant may appeal the denial of such application to the United States court of appeals for the circuit wherein such applicant resides or has his principal place of business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, within sixty days after the entry of the Secretary's final order denying such application.

"(f)(1) If the manufacturer of an infant formula has knowledge which reasonably supports the conclusion that an infant formula which has been processed by the manufacturer and which has left an establishment subject to the control of the manufacturer—

"(A) may not provide the nutrients required by subsection (j); or

"(B) may be otherwise adulterated or misbranded, the manufacturer shall promptly notify the Secretary of such knowledge and shall immediately take all actions necessary to recall shipments of such infant formula from all wholesale and retail establishments, and to assist such retail establishments in publicizing such recall in a manner reasonably designed to notify purchasers of such infant formula of such recall and the reasons for such recall.

"(2) For purposes of this paragraph (1), the term 'knowledge' as applied to a manufacturer means (A) the actual knowledge that the manufacturer had, or (B) the knowledge which a reasonable person would have had under like circumstances or which would have been obtained upon the exercise of due care.

"(g)(1) If a recall of an infant formula is begun by a manufacturer, the recall shall be carried out in accordance with such requirements as the Secretary shall prescribe under paragraph (2), and—

"(A) the Secretary shall, not later than the 15th day after the beginning of such recall and at least once every 15 days thereafter until the recall is terminated, review the actions taken under the recall to determine whether the recall meets the requirements prescribed under paragraph (2); and

"(B) the manufacturer shall, not later than the 14th day after the beginning of such recall and at least once every 14 days thereafter until the recall is terminated, report to the Secretary the actions taken to implement the recall.

"(2) The Secretary shall by regulation prescribe the scope and extent of recalls of infant formulas necessary and appropriate for the degree of risk to human health presented by the formula subject to the recall.".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee, and at this time I also want to take this opportunity to express to him how pleased all of us are that he has joined us by reason of the recent election.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate my friend from Ohio having such kind words to say, and I am pleased to join him in introducing this important corrective legislation. He has accurately stated the history of this matter in the previous two Congresses. As he has informed the Senate, the intent of the legislation has been frustrated. Indeed, the regulations implementing the Infant Formula Act of 1980 were held up in the Office of Management and Budget for almost 2 years. And during that time, we had another unfortunate instance where thousands of infants throughout the country were given deficient infant formula. And this was an unnecessary episode.

The Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration testified at that time that if the quality control regulations had been implemented by the Food and Drug Administration, that incident would not have occurred.

Belatedly, after this unfortunate incident occurred, the Food and Drug Administration finally did put out regulations, but there was a vast difference between the proposed and final versions of these regulations. The FDA substituted vague, general standards for the specific proposed rules, and so altered the original proposal that the two versions cannot be compared in a meaningful manner. The agency adopted, virtually in every respect, the suggestions of the infant formula industry to relax the proposed rules.

In fact, the degree of difference between the proposed and final regulations was so great that FDA's own legal counsel questioned their legality. In a well-reasoned memorandum, he concluded:

The changes being made in the regulation from proposal to draft tentative are far greater than any of those that have been upheld so far. Ultimately, I believe that many courts will have trouble accepting the argument that a consumer group will have had a meaningful opportunity to participate in rule making when the original rule has been so completely transformed as to preclude a productive section-by-section comparison.

The greatest shortcoming was in the quality control provisions of the regulations, where FDA decided-upon the urging of the infant formula industry—not to require testing of the final product. This left the new infant formula quality control regulations less stringent than the agency's quality control regulations for such low-priority medical devices as tongue depressers.

During a hearing which I chaired at that time, then Secretary Schweiker responded to my question on this matter by stating:

Mr. Chairman, let me say I was not aware of the facts you are bringing to my attention now. I, frankly, think they should be investigated.

Mr. President, despite those hearings and numerous inquiries, the final regulations did not change and they still do not provide sufficient safeguards.

The legislation which is being introducted this morning by the Senator from Ohio and myself is intended to fill these gaps, and is intended to serve the original purpose of the legislation which was introduced back in 1980.

I think it is fair important to say that there has been a great deal of progress since the Infant Formula Act of 1980 was passed, and the regulations implementing it, though tardy, have caused some improvement in the situation. But they are still inadequate and they do still have loopholes. This legislation being introduced today is intended to correct the situation.

And I am pleased to join the Senator from Ohio in introducing this bill.

I yield back to my colleague.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

PENNSYLVANIA FLOOD CONTROL PROJECTS—REINTRODUCTION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing for Senator HEINZ and myself four bills that provide for the authorization of flood control projects located in Lock Haven (Clinton County), Harrisburg (Dauphin County), Wyoming Valley (Luzerne County), and Milton (Northumberland County), PA. Passage of these bills is essential to protecting the health and safety of the residents of these areas.

I introduced these bills in the 97th and 98th Congress as well. The first three of these bills were incorporated into both the Senate—S. 1739—and House—H.R. 3678—versions of the Water Resources Development Act of 1983. I have continually worked with my colleagues to bring this vital legislation, which was reported out of committee, to the floor. In addition, I supported the effort to include this bill in the continuing resolution of 1985. Unfortunately, this legislation was stripped from the continuing resolution in a compromise package. However, I intend to persist in this matter because of the importance of these projects.

All of these proposed projects are on the Susquehanna River: the first two on the main river; the latter two on the west branch. The cities of Wilkes-Barre, Harrisburg, Lock Haven, Milton, and other nearby communities were devastated by a series of floods in late June 1972 from the heavy rains of tropical storm Agnes. These projects are in response to that widespread flooding and to a subsequent flood from Hurricane Eloise a few years later.

With respect to Lock Haven, it should be noted that nearly the entire city is subject to flooding from the Susquehanna River and from Bald Eagle Creek. The city has been flooded 19 times in the last 130 years. As in other areas, the most damaging flood occurred in 1972 when tropical storm Agnes inundated the entire business district and much of the residential areas of the city and adjoining townships.

The Corps of Engineers' plan would provide a local flood protection system consisting of levees, floodwalls, interior drainage works, highways, and railroad closure structures. Also, the corps is considering the removal of structures affected by flooding in communities directly across the river from Lock Haven. Because of the importance of this project, Congress has approved a total of $1.2 million in the past 2 years for the continuation of planning and engineering [CP&E] for this project, which has a total estimated cost of $69.8 million. The time has come to follow through on the excellent work the corps has already done.

Due to increased urbanization, flooding from Paxton Creek along the industrial corridor of Harrisburg is a perennial problem. This area is also subject to backwater flooding from the Susquehanna River. As a result of tropical storm Agnes, which caused damages estimated at $55 million, the Army Corps of Engineers recommended in 1979 a flood control project for the South Harrisburg-Paxton Creek area which would include a floodwall 3,800 feet long. Since fiscal year 1982, $2.178 million has been appropriated for the CP&E. The estimated cost for the entire project is $123 million.

The Corps of Engineers also recommended favorable action, in general concurrence with the findings and recommendations of the Baltimore district engineer in the North Atlantic division, concerning increased flood protection in the Wyoming Valley flood control system. Tropical storm Agnes, the most severe storm on record, exceeded the existing levee system by 4 to 5 feet. Flood damages in the area were estimated to have $730 million at June 1972 price levels. Were the Wyoming Valley area to suffer, under today's conditions, another flood of equal magnitude to that caused by Hurricane Agnes, damages would total in excess of $1 billion.

The existing Federal flood control system in Wilkes-Barre provides only a 50-year design level of flood protection for what the Corps of Engineers correctly identifies as an intensively developed major urban area. The corps' plan would protect the Wyoming Valley against a flood magnitude equal to that caused by tropical storm Agnes.

The recommended plan will raise the existing levee system in the Wyoming Valley by 5 to 7 feet, provide new closure and drainage structures, construct a new pumping station, and provide new levees and floodwalls to maintain the system's integrity at five communities in the Wyoming Valley. The five communities are: First, Wilkes-Barre/Hanover Township; second, Swoyersville/Forty-Fort; third, Exeter/West Pittston; fourth, Kingston/Edwardsville; and fifth, Plymouth.

Induced flooding from raising the existing levee system will be mitigated at eight communities. Mitigation at five of the communities with existing flood protection projects—Sunbury, Danville, Brookside, Miners Mills, and Duryea—will be accomplished by raising levees or floodwalls. At two communities, Plainsville and Port Blanchard, nonstructural mitigation measures consisting of a combination of evacuation, flood-proofing, relocation, and a ring levee-floodwall system will be employed. At Bloomsburg, the mitigation measure will consist of removal of an abandoned Conrail bridge. Congress appropriated $1.8 million for CP&E for this project which has a total cost of $224 million.

The Borough of Milton in Northumberland County was also devastated by tropical storm Agnes in 1972. Located along the west branch of the Susquehanna River, the Milton area has a variety of structural flaws that make it prone to flooding. In 1972, for example, tropical storm Agnes ravaged a large portion of the Susquehanna River basin, causing millions of dollars worth of damage to Milton and various other population centers. Without this badly needed flood control project, Milton will continue to exist under the threat of severe destruction from future storms. The Corps of Engineers estimates the cost of the Milton project to be $87 million. The possibility of future destruction from flooding and the necessity of providing valuable jobs to this region make the Milton project important to central Pennsylvania.

It has been proposed that the cost sharing policies of the past be abandoned and more stringent requirements be placed on State, local, and private interests. I suggest that, while cost sharing may have its merits, some allowance must be made for a community's ability to pay. In the meantime, we need to authorize these four flood control projects promptly to meet our obligation to protect the lives and property of our citizens. Pennsylvanians wonder why, in over 12 years after a devastating flood, these four needed projects have not been authorized.

Mr. President, it is my view that serious consideration should be given at the present time to the public works projects which are necessary, demonstrably so, at a time when there is a real need to provide jobs.

The projects authorized by the four bills that I am reintroducing today should have been accomplished long before this day. They certainly should be addressed now, and doubly so in the context of the national need to provide jobs for unemployed Americans.

I ask unanimous consent that the full texts of the four proposed bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

S. 267—REINTRODUCTION OF THE PRESQUE ISLE PROJECT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing a bill for Senator HEINZ and myself to authorize the construction of a system of breakwaters along the lakeward length of Presque Isle Peninsula on Lake Erie in the northwest corner of Pennsylvania. I introduced this bill in the 97th and 98th Congress as well.

The Presque Isle State Park is one of Pennsylvania's, and the Nation's, greatest natural treasures. The park is a popular recreational area and provides facilities for a wide spectrum of recreational opportunities. The year-round attractiveness of the park is shown by the over 4 million visits that are made to it annually.

In 1956, the Federal Government, in cooperation with the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, completed a beach erosion control project on Presque Isle Peninsula. As I observed last year when I visited Presque Isle, the project has proven to be inadequate. Sand replenishment measures have been required periodically through the 1960's and 1970's and annually since 1975, in order to protect the Federal structures and State park facilities along the neck of the peninsula. Since actual sand replenishment requirements have far exceeded estimates, a more effective method of protection and beach stabilization has become necessary.

The Corps of Engineers has recommended a plan of improvement that provides for construction of a system of rubblemound breakwaters located offshore along the lakeward length of Presque Isle Peninsula, parallel to the shoreline, and positioned in the trough between the first and second offshore sand bars. Each structure will be 150 feet long with a 350-foot gap between structures. In addition, sand fill will be placed along the shoreline in the lee of the breakwaters to provide a recreational beach berm.

The system of offshore breakwaters allows sufficient wave energy to pass through the gap between breakwater segments to generate an along-shore current in the lee of the breakwater system. Therefore, natural shore processes will continue to transport sand in quantities that will preserve the integrity of the natural environment, especially the sensitive and unique portion of the Ecological Reservation on the east end of the peninsula. An important element of the recommended plan will be the operation of a post-construction monitoring program that would note the presence of any adverse sediment transport impacts. Should adverse impacts arise, the annual replenishment program would be adjusted to provide sand in order to eliminate, minimize, or ameliorate possible adverse environmental impacts.

Recognizing the value of this project, Congress included it in both the Senate (S. 1739) and House (H.R. 3678) versions of the Water Resources Development Act of 1983. Additionally, Congress has already appropriated $1.1 million for the continuation of planning and engineering of this project since fiscal year 1983. The project costs would be $27 million.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the proposal will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 267

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to implement a project for the control of beach erosion at Presque Isle Peninsula, Pennsylvania, substantially in accordance with, and subject to conditions recommended in, the Report of the Chief of Engineers dated October 2, 1981, at an estimated cost of $27,000,000.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, 67 years ago, on January 22, 1917, the Ukrainian Central Council proudly proclaimed: "From this day on the Ukrainian National Republic becomes an independent, subordinate to no one, free sovereign state of the Ukrainian people." Yet, the new sovereign nation which had suffered centuries of czarist domination could only maintain 3 years of independence. For as soon as the Communists consolidated power in Russia, they turned their Red army toward the Ukraine, and although the Ukrainians fought vehemently to protect their young liberated nation, the Communists, by the summer of 1920, had successfully brutalized the Ukraine into submission. In just 3 short years, Soviet domination had replaced czarist domination.

Since 1920, the Ukrainians have been subjected to the severest forms of repression and Russification. As we know, in 1932-33, when the Ukrainians refused to accept Stalin's plan to collectivise farming, he responded by confiscating enough Ukrainian grain to create a tragic famine which took the lives of an estimated 7 to 10 million.

Although this unforgivable act of Soviet repression has been the severest, it has been by no means the lone act of brutality. In fact, throughout Soviet dominated Ukrainian history, any Ukrainian who has openly spoke of his nation's oppression or desire for freedom has been harassed, imprisoned and, in some cases, tortured. Yet, despite the Soviet Union's attempt to destroy Ukrainian culture, tradition and spirit in the hopes of Russification, the Ukrainian drive and quest for freedom remains as strong as ever. We must, in the free world, show our support, and share the dream of the persistent land of 50 million—the same dream our forefathers had over 200 years ago.

Mr. President, comments on the Ukraine are especially significant to me because my father, Harry Specter, came to the United States in 1911 from the Ukraine, fleeing czarist domination. He had left his family there. He came as a young man of 18 to save his life in the United States.

In July of 1982, I had occasion to visit the Soviet Union. I traveled from Moscow to Kiev, by automobile to the Ukraine, and visited the hometown of my father.

I found an elderly gentleman who did know my grandfather, Avram Spectorsky there.

In recognizing Ukrainian Independence Day, it is of special significance for me personally that I do so, in light of my own roots going to a small village by the name of Batchkurina, near Kiev in the Ukraine.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

THE AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CRISIS

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the economic indicators we are seeing now and the reaction of the stock market to the rather favorable economic indicators are not truly reflecting the uncertainty of a continued economic recovery. I say that because there is growing evidence of a very serious agricultural credit crisis that is facing the agricultural producers of this country.

Of course, when the agricultural producers are in trouble, it is not just their own individual operations and their own individual farmers. It is a crisis for their lenders and for all the people involved in what we called agribusiness.

Almost 21 or 22 percent of the people in this country are directly or indirectly involved in agriculture. It is our most basic and by far the largest industry of this country, even though relatively few Americans are directly involved in farming or ranching. From cowboys to truckers, to the people who run our trains, to the people in the steel mills and in the manufacturing business, to the vast chemical industry and the supplies they make available for fertilizers and other products used by agriculture, a great number of people are involved in the outcome of the agricultural producers' plight.

As part of the agricultural credit crisis that has been developing, three of the production credit associations in Montana abruptly liquidated over the past 8 weeks; and part of the sequence of trouble in this district, the 12th district of the farm credit system, with its headquarters at Spokane, was reflected in these three PCA's in Montana.

There has been concern among commercial banks in Montana and in the upper plains States in addition to the concern of those connected with the Production Credit Association and the farm credit system. This concern was compounded with the failure of the Farmers Home Administration in not being able to keep up with the commercial agricultural loans.

All this prompted me to call for a hearing, representing the Senate Agriculture Committee, on Saturday afternoon, January 12, at Helena, MT. We thought it was high time to hear from the people involved, how the credit crisis developed, and what their ideas were for necessary action. At that hearing on Saturday, January 12, we heard from lenders of the farm credits system, commercial banks, and the Farmers Home Administration. We heard from the borrowers, those involved in agriculture. Though there were different aspects presented in their testimony, three key points were reflected in all the testimony that was received from all these sources.

First, the price received by agricultural producers for their products has been pretty low, and it has not been getting better. Indeed, these are the lowest commodity prices, which result in the lowest net farm income for 1983, 1984, and projected into 1985, since the Great Depression. That is the first point. If there is going to be a turnaround in the agricultural credit situation for these producers, there has to be some improvement in prices.

Second, it became obvious that the interest rates are too high for America's farmers and ranchers. It is running 14 percent to 15 percent; and combined with low prices and high interest rates, it is a surefire recipe for going broke.

The third point that was brought out clearly from all sources of testimony, whether it was the Farmers Home Administration or the farm credit system or the commercial bankers or the farmers and ranchers, was that there had to be a stretch out of credit for those agricultural producers who are now in credit trouble.

So, obviously, the time for concerted action by Congress and the administration is now. It is not a question of Republicans versus Democrats. It is really a question of Republicans and Democrats in Congress and in the administration working together, cooperatively, to develop the types of planning and the types of action that will be necessary.

I am not here today prepared to say what actions may become necessary. But I can say this: Farmers, their bankers, and their creditors are reflecting true concerns for the problems that do indeed exist.

This past several days our colleagues from Nebraska have shared this same type of concern with me and with other Members of the Senate, telling us about a meeting last Saturday at Sioux City, NE, where 4,500 farmers met to describe the bind they are in and the situation they are finding with the lack of credit not being sufficient to meet their needs.

An open air meeting in St. Paul before the State capitol also this week found 10,000 to 12,000 farmers expressing their concerns and demanding some appropriate action be taken by their legislators meeting in the Minnesota legislature. The repeated theme of both the legislators and the farmers at the St. Paul meeting was that there had to be concern not only in the States involved but there had to be concern in Washington, DC, and Congress itself.

I have urged Chairman HELMS of the Agriculture Committee to hold a hearing on the agriculture credit crisis but he believes that it is premature at this time, making one point, among others, that the farm credit system is meeting in San Antonio this week.

What the farm credit system boards will come up with as a recommendation I am not certain, but I am anxious to hear from them and to see how we fit in as Members of the Senate in assisting them in this crisis.

There will be a meeting by the Farm Credit Council, I understand, here in Washington next week and that is very timely.

As Senators, I believe that our first task is to hear from the people involved in this credit crisis, hear from the producers, hear from the farm credit system, hear from the Farmers Home Administration and from the commercial banks.

For that reason, I have asked agricultural leaders, farm producers themselves, and their bankers to testify next Wednesday, January 30, here in Washington.

I ask that all interested Senators consider whether or not they would like to participate. It will be a public meeting. The room we have scheduled is room 628 in the Dirksen Building. It will commence at 10 a.m. That is Wednesday, January 30, and I invite all my colleagues to consider whether or not they would like to participate in such a meeting.

Our goal has to be a united front, without partisanship, but a front that is ready to respond with whatever actions are needed to meet the very serious crisis that is existing at the moment and is continuing to build into a worse situation.

Agricultural producers must have the credit that is necessary to keep them in business, and I repeat it is not just for them. It is for their creditors; it is for the sake of the country.

INAUGURAL LUNCHEON REMARKS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, on Monday, the official proceedings of the inaugural ceremony were printed in the RECORD as is the custom of Congress.

Today, to complete the RECORD, I wish to introduce the informal remarks that were made in the form of toasts at the inaugural luncheon following the swearing-in ceremonies. I ask unanimous consent that those remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCHANGE OF TOASTS AT THE INAUGURAL LUNCHEON

TOAST TO PRESIDENT REAGAN BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON INAUGURAL CEREMONIES SENATOR CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, JR.

Mr. President, you are the star of this show! Of course, you have a beautiful leading lady and a super co-star. But you also have a great supporting cast—literally hundreds of people who have helped with this production as stage hands, carpenters, spearcarriers and in dozens of other ways. On behalf of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies, I want to thank each one of them.

But every show needs an impresario to generate ideas, find the resources and meet the deadlines. My wife Ann has done all of this. I gratefully confess that she is the de facto Chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Activities, and she is responsible for this luncheon and its theme.

By assembling here from every corner of the country we are symbols of a more perfect union. We celebrate the constitutional goals of justice, tranquility and liberty guaranteed by law. But law itself was not the end, it was the means by which Americans could attain a unique quality of life.

John Adams said it succinctly:

I must study politics and war, that my sons may * * * study mathematics * * * and agriculture, in order to give their children a right to study painting, poetry, architecture, statuary, tapestry and porcelain * * *

We today are the heirs of that vision! We are the posterity who are secure in the blessings of liberty. And we are the children's children who enjoy the quality of life that John Adams anticipated.

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, to mark this day of celebration, of achievement and of thankfulness, it is my honor to present a crystal bowl to each of you, on behalf of the Congress and the American people.

Mr. President, the base of your bowl is engraved with the noble purposes of the Constitution of which you are the sworn protector.

Mr. Vice President, the base of your bowl is engraved with Thomas Jefferson's psalm of liberty that we heard sung so beautifully today.

Ladies and gentleman, I ask you to rise and join me in a toast—To The President of the United States.

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT IN AN EXCHANGE OF TOASTS

Senator Mathias, honorable members of the House, and distinguished guests, and members of the Senate, of course, this has been an historic day and it's not over yet. Together we mark the end of one term and the beginning of another. And I want each of you to know how grateful I am for all that you've done—all the energy and personal commitment that you have mustered in these last four years to make our system work.

In the shifting alliances of a free government, we in this room have been intense allies and—and on some issues but—while disagreeing on others. But I think the level of respect and courtesy with which we've treated each other speaks well for us and confirms the viability of this great democratic system which is now in our care.

There's been quite a few inaugurations in my lifetime. I missed Abe Lincoln's but—(laughter)—I do remember Calvin Coolidge's. (Laughter.) Even though I was of the other party at the time, I—he was much loved and respected. I was a Democrat in those days.

His Inaugural Address said, "Our Congress represents the people and the states. In all legislative affairs, they are the national—the natural collaborator of the—with the President. In spite of all the criticism which often falls to its lot, I do not hesitate to say that there is no more independent and effective legislative body in the world. It is, and should be, jealous of its prerogatives. I welcome the cooperation and expect to share with it not only the responsibility but the credit for our common effort to secure beneficial legislation," Calvin Coolidge.

Well, I hope we can work together in that same spirit. I have a plaque on my desk in the office that says what I firmly believe and that is there is no limit to what a man can accomplish if he doesn't—what he can do and where he can go if he doesn't care who gets the credit. (Laughter.)

So, I hope in the days and the years to come that we can move ahead, meet the challenges of our day, thinking only of how much we can accomplish if we maintain our good will and cooperation.

We're very grateful to you for these gifts. And may I offer a toast to all of you here, the members of the Congress, all the guests who are here with you and to the best Vice President this country has ever had, George Bush, and to the next four years. (Applause.)

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

Senator MATHIAS. The distinguished Republican leader of the House of Representatives, Bob Michel.

Congressman MICHEL. Thank you, Mac. (Applause.)

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, Mr. Speaker and Mr. Chief Justice, your wives and ladies and ladies and gentlemen, four years ago, we presented to the President one of the letter openers that was used in opening the Electoral College ballots that came in from the state.

We'd like to do that again this year, in addition to give the Vice President one, but, Mr. Speaker, we're going to spare you any—we're just going to spare you by not reading the inscription on the plaque because of the number on the Electoral College vote. (Laughter.)

There's one other here that I'd like to present to the President on behalf of the leadership of both the House and Senate, Republican and Democrat alike.

Mr. President, you've been very good to come up to the Hill every once in awhile, not only with official messages, but when you just had an informal word to say, from time to time. As you know, beyond this beautiful picture here is a normal route to the House of Representatives. When this Chamber was once the old Chamber, and then, as we developed the new Chamber beyond it, there were a set of beautiful bronze doors that were between the two, that are now down in the East Portico of the Capitol.

We have here for you, Mr. President, a likeness prepared by one of our craftsmen here in the Capitol, and also a very special key to those doors; because, as you know, the Speaker pretty well controls this side of the Capitol over here. (Laughter.) In the event you want to come up sometime for some reason, for whatever—(Laughter)—here's the key to the Capitol and to the House of Representatives. (Applause.)

The PRESIDENT. I've just been told we should get out of here. (Laughter.) They said I could do anything I wanted on the way out, so I just want to express a heartfelt thanks. These are wonderful things to have in celebration of this day. And, Tip, do you want to have a key, too. (Laughter.) If you don't, feel free to borrow it anytime. (Laughter.) All right, thank you all very much. (Laughter.)

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. MCCONNELL]. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Michigan.

THE MEESE NOMINATION

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I come to the Chamber today because I am troubled by the pending nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General, and I want to lay before my colleagues the reasons for my unease. Some are of a generally known nature, and I will only briefly touch on those issues. Others pertain to a series of written exchanges that I had with Mr. Meese over the so-called Carter papers in the Reagan campaign, and these are the concerns I wish to share with our colleagues in some detail today.

My involvement in the nomination of Mr. Meese stems from my role as ranking minority member of the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management. That subcommittee has jurisdiction over the ethics laws—their enforcement and their administration through the Office of Government Ethics. Because the investigation into the Carter papers conducted by the Human Resources Subcommittee in the House of Representatives, chaired by former Congressman Donald Albosta, questioned the need for changes in the ethics laws, I followed that investigation closely. And since our Oversight Subcommittee recently amended and, I believed, improved, the statute governing the appointment and role of the independent counsel, I took the time to follow the investigation by Jacob Stein of Mr. Meese and to read Mr. Stein's report. In other words, I have spent a considerable amount of time looking into Mr. Meese's qualifications by reading the available relevant materials.

Neither of these investigations resulted in findings that Mr. Meese violated any civil or criminal law, and there is an understandable inclination to feel that this disposes of the matter. Mr. Meese has been investigated and found unindictable. But is that enough? Anyone who has read the independent counsel's report carefully will quickly conclude that is certainly not enough. The independent counsel's report details a pattern of questionable conduct by Mr. Meese in case after case which paints a picture of a man who frequently seems to ignore the ethical implications of his actions. The instances of particular concern to me are:

First, Mr. Meese's retention of his rank of colonel in the Army Reserve, knowing that his promotion to that rank could only have been made as a result of reinstatement to active status made in violation of Army Reserve regulations and the preferential granting of constructive educational credit;

Second, the fact that Mr. Meese failed to either recuse himself from or disclose his personal involvement in the appointments of John McKean and Thomas Barrack, with whom he had significant financial dealings, when their nominations to office in the executive branch came before the Senior Staff Personnel Committee for approval;

Third, his failure to disclose, as required by law, either the $15,000 loan from his then top aide, Edwin Thomas, or the Biotech stock which was purchased with the loan moneys;

Fourth, his participation in the receipt of $10,000 from the transition trust for what was to be the cost of moving expenses and his subsequent direction to the secretary of the trust to change the trust records and the canceled checks to show payment for consulting fees once it became evident that it was illegal to be reimbursed by the trust for such moving expenses.

These instances raise questions relating to the ethical judgment so much expected of the Attorney General of the United States, who serves as the Nation's top law enforcement officer and, indeed, who serves as administrator of its ethics in Government laws and regulations. But these examples are already known, as I said earlier, to many of our colleagues, Mr. President.

I have an additional reason for concern over this nomination, a concern relating to the recent investigation into the so-called Carter papers by both the Albosta Subcommittee and the Independent Counsel. During those investigations Mr. Meese was shown numerous documents which referred to "our White House source," or "a very reliable source," or "a very reliable Carter aide," or "an unimpeachable source who has received information from ABC XYZ," or "reliable White House mole." Mr. Meese was either the named recipient of one or more such documents or a person to whom a copy was sent, or the document was found in his personal files. In analyzing Mr. Meese's recollection, or lack thereof, of these documents, it is apparent to me that Mr. Meese seems not to remember those documents which either on their face appear to be the most potentially damaging to him or the possession of which may be the most ethically questionable. But he does remember many documents which are apparently innocuous or harmless.

I am troubled by this pattern of Mr. Meese's memory and by Mr. Meese's evasive answers to questions submitted to him on my behalf during the first set of hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee. I asked Mr. Meese, for the record, to: "Please state what personal knowledge he had relative to President Carter's papers being physically available to the Reagan campaign." He replied to that question as follows: "I have no knowledge of any effort by the 1980 Reagan-Bush (sic) Presidential campaign, or anybody associated with that campaign, to obtain from the Carter administration, or the 1980 Carter-Mondale Presidential campaign, any private material or information."

While it may be helpful to know that Mr. Meese was not aware of any effort to obtain Carter campaign or White House materials, that was not responsive to the question I had asked him. I had asked him if he had any personal knowledge of Carter campaign or White House materials being present in the Reagan campaign. So I tried again. On March 9, 1984, I wrote to Mr. Meese, stating that his reply to my question had been nonresponsive. I asked him again to answer my earlier question specifically and in full. Mr. Meese never answered that letter. On March 25, 1984, a New York Times reporter asked Mr. Meese a similar question. The reporter wrote, "(H)e (Meese) was silent for a few moments and then said, I had no knowledge of any effort to obtain them."

Because Mr. Meese's nomination was in question during the pendency of the Stein investigation, I witheld purusing the matter further at that time, until it became apparent that Mr. Meese's name would again be submitted to the Senate for approval.

When that became clear, I wrote to Mr. Meese again. In a letter dated December 21, 1984, I asked Mr. Meese to state whether or not he remembered seeing eight specific documents from the 1980 Presidential campaign, and I restated my earlier question. "Did you during the 1980 Presidential campaign believe, or have any knowledge, that copies of nonpublic documents from the White House or the Carter campaign were physically available to, or in the possession of, the Reagan Campaign?" I also asked Mr. Meese: "During the 1980 Presidential campaign were you aware of, or did you believe that, a source, or sources, inside the White House and/or the Carter campaign was providing nonpublic information to the Reagan Campaign?"

Mr. Meese answered that letter yesterday. He said he did not remember seeing any of the eight documents I listed and he stated: "To the best of my recollection, during the 1980 Presidential campaign I did not believe or have any knowledge that copies of nonpublic documents that had been improperly obtained from the White House or the Carter campaign were physically available to or in the possession of the Reagan campaign; nor was I aware of nor did I believe that a source, or sources, inside the White House and/or the Carter campaign was improperly providing nonpublic information to the Reagan campaign."

I ask unanimous consent that copies of these letters and documents be printed in the RECORD immediately following my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. LEVIN. Now, again, Mr. Meese evades the clear questions. I did not ask whether Mr. Meese had known about nonpublic Carter documents being improperly obtained. I asked if he knew if nonpublic Carter documents were in the Reagan campaign, period, however they had been obtained.

The evasiveness of Mr. Meese in answering what I think is a simple and straightforward question triggers two reactions. First, I am concerned that a nominee for the position of Attorney General is unwilling to be forthright in answering a question of some importance, at least to this Senator. Second, his evasiveness tells me that he is well aware of the purpose of my line of inquiry and wants to avoid it. If Mr. Meese knew nonpublic Carter campaign or White House documents were in the Reagan campaign, he would have had to have judged whether or not they were properly obtained. That was the ethical issue that confronted him then, and the actions he took in response are what we must judge now. From his answer of January 23, one could infer that he in fact did see nonpublic documents which were, according to him, properly obtained. But to actually admit that, openly and directly, Mr. Meese would then be subject to the question as to what steps he took to determine whether or not the nonpublic documents which he saw had been obtained properly. Because of his evasiveness, I am led to believe that Mr. Meese does not want to answer that question. If Mr. Meese saw nonpublic documents and asked about the propriety of the Reagan campaign having or using them, then we need to know what questions he asked, of whom and by what standard he decided what was proper or improper.

Mr. Meese, in an interview with the staff of the Albosta subcommittee was asked about the ethics of the presence or use of nonpublic documents from the Carter campaign or White House in the Reagan campaign. He said that, in the words of the subcommittee investigator "it would depend on how the material was acquired and how it was used." Later, in the same interview, he said it would depend "on how it came into the hands of the campaign." Still later in the same interview, he said it "would depend on the source of the information." These are questions pertaining to Mr. Meese's ethical judgment that must be answered before his fitness for the office of Attorney General can be fully judged. Specifically, I feel obligated to find out whether Mr. Meese will admit or deny, without evasiveness or equivocation, that he knew of the presence or use of nonpublic Carter documents in the Reagan campaign. And, if he did, what effort did he make to determine whether or not having or using such nonpublic Carter papers was proper. And, if he made that effort, we deserve to know Mr. Meese's basis for judging the propriety of the use or presence of such documents. Did it depend upon the source of the nonpublic documents, the manner in which they were obtained, or how the nonpublic documents were used by the Reagan campaign?

So, it comes down to this: Did Mr. Meese know that there were nonpublic Carter documents present in the Reagan campaign? What did he do to find out if they got there properly? How did he judge right from wrong? These are three questions to which the Senate is owed simple and straightforward answers.

I will be asking Mr. Meese these questions for the record during the Judiciary Committee hearing on his nomination. I invite members of the Judiciary Committee to pursue this line of inquiry at the hearings in person. Much of Mr. Meese's conduct as a public official has been thoroughly reviewed by the 385 page Stein report. Those findings, alone, give me pause and demand further inquiries of Mr. Meese as to his ethical judgments on a number of those issues. It is also important, however, that Mr. Meese be required to explain his evasiveness to questions concerning the Carter papers over the past year and that his judgment calls on these matters also be probed in depth.

Mr. President, if Mr. Meese continues to refuse to answer these questions and thereby denies the Senate the opportunity to review the implications his answers would have in assessing his ethical judgment, the Senate should not proceed to confirm him.

EXHIBIT 1

QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENATOR CARL LEVIN FOR SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE HEARING RECORD IN MARCH 1984

Please state what personal knowledge you have relative to President Carter's papers being physically available to the Reagan Campaign.

RESPONSES OF EDWIN MEESE III TO QUESTIONS SUBMITTED BY SENTOR CARL LEVIN

I have no knowledge of any effort by the 1980 Reagan-Bush presidential campaign, or anybody associated with that campaign to obtain from the Carter Administration, or the 1980 Carter-Mondale presidential campaign, any private materials or information.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington DC, March 9, 1984.

Mr. EDWIN MEESE III,
Counsellor to the President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MEESE: On March 7, 1984, Senator Thurmond, Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, forwarded to you on my behalf two questions regarding the allegations that President Carter's papers ended up in the Reagan campaign. The questions and your responses are attached. Your answers to my questions were unresponsive, and so I am now writing to request that you directly and specifically respond to those portions of the questions that were not addressed in your responses.

Specifically, I asked for the substance and dates of all conversations you had with James Baker or Bill Casey relative to the Carter papers. You answered relative to Mr. Casey but, relative to Mr. Baker, simple said that you had had "very general conversations with James A. Baker, III, concerning this subject." I asked for the substance and you responded with a characterization rather than substance.

I also asked for any personal knowledge that you had relative to the Carter papers, "being physically available to the Reagan campaign." Instead of answering the question, you said that you knew of no effort by the presidential campaign to obtain the papers. Again your answers were unresponsive. I did not ask whether the Reagan campaign made an effort to obtain them, but about your personal knowledge relative to their being physically available to the Reagan campaign.

I would request that you promptly respond to my questions specifically and in full.

Sincerely,

CARL LEVIN.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, December 21, 1984.

Mr. EDWIN MEESE III,
Counsellor to the President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MEESE: I would appreciate your notifying me by letter whether you remember seeing the following attached documents during the 1980 Presidential Campaign:

Memorandum from Bob Garrick to Ed Meese, dated September 12, 1980;

Memorandum from Bob Garrick to Ed Meese, dated September 4, 1980;

Memorandum from Bob Gray to Bill Timmons, dated October 21, 1980;

Memorandum from Wayne Valis to Jim Baker, dated October 21, 1980;

Memorandum from Thelma Duggin to Art Teele, dated October 17, 1980;

Memorandum from Dick Allen to Governor Reagan, Bill Casey, Ed Meese and Dick Wirthlin, dated October 15, 1980;

Memorandum from Max Hugel to Ed Meese, dated August 11, 1980;

Memorandum from Dan Jones to Bob Gray, Bill Casey and Ed Meese, dated October 27, 1980.

I would also appreciate your written response to the following question: Did you during the 1980 Presidential Campaign believe, or have any knowledge, that copies of non-public documents from the White House or the Carter Campaign were physically available to, or in the possession of, the Reagan Campaign? (When I asked you a similar question before, you responded that you knew of no effort by the 1980 Reagan Campaign to obtain such materials. That was a non-responsive answer, since I was asking about your knowledge or belief relative to the physical presence of those documents in the Reagan Campaign and not relative to any effort to obtain that physical presence.)

Finally, I would appreciate your written response to the following question: During the 1980 Presidential Campaign were you aware of, or did you believe that, a source (or sources) inside the White House and/or the Carter Campaign was providing non-public information to the Reagan Campaign?

A letter to me responding to these questions by one week before your confirmation hearing would be most appreciated. Thank you.

Sincerely,

CARL LEVIN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 23, 1985.

Hon. CARL LEVIN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: In response to the questions set forth in your 21 December 1984 letter, I do not remember seeing, during the 1980 Presidential campaign, the documents described in your letter.

To the best of my recollection, during the 1980 Presidential campaign I did not believe or have any knowledge that copies of non-public documents that had been improperly obtained from the White House or the Carter campaign were physically available to or in the possession of the Reagan campaign; nor was I aware of nor did I believe that a source (or sources) inside the White House and/or the Carter campaign was improperly providing non-public information to the Reagan campaign.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Counsellor to the President.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection,it is so ordered.

(Mr. SYMMS assumed the chair.)

A NATIONAL TAX AMNESTY PLAN

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Federal budget deficit in fiscal year 1984 was an appalling $175 billion. The latest estimate for the fiscal 1985 deficit prepared by the President's Office of Management and Budget is even worse—$205 billion. This ongoing budget crisis, however, seems to defy the efforts of Congress and the President to end it. Budget deficits are not under control, in spite of the major efforts to cut spending over the past 4 years, and in spite of the passage of two major tax increase bills in the last 3 years.

There are a lot of reasons for our budget crisis. One very important reason that has not received anywhere near the attention it deserves has to do with tax compliance levels.

In 1981, the most recent year for which comprehensive data is available, Federal tax collections were more than $81 billion—yes, I said $81 billion—below what they would have been if every taxpayer had paid his or her legal tax obligations. Individual taxpayers failed to report to the Internal Revenue Service almost $250 billion in income that year.

Unfortunately, 1981 is not an unusual year. The tax gap was more than $28 billion in 1973, or approximately double the Federal budget deficit of $14 billion that year, and it has increased steadily since then. The Treasury Department is estimating a tax gap of between—this is almost unbelievable—$89 and $92 billion for 1985, and believes that level could rise to between $386 and $473 billion by the turn of the century.

These figures indicate that there is something fundamentally wrong with our national tax collection system. The tax gap is growing not just because the economy is growing, but also because taxpayers are increasingly not paying the taxes they owe. A recent story in the Wall Street Journal illustrates the point. It states that, "the IRS says, 19 percent of those surveyed admit to cheating on their taxes, and that probably is an underestimate of the actual number who do."

Our tax collection system in the past was able to rely on voluntary compliance with the tax laws, but that voluntary compliance is breaking down. For example, in 1973, more than 90 percent of all dividends were reported; by 1981, that percentage fell to approximately 83 percent. In 1973, over 75 percent of all capital gains were reported; by 1981, that percentage had fallen below 60 percent. According to the Internal Revenue Service, there is currently about 80 percent compliance overall among individuals and about 90 percent compliance for corporations.

The Service believes that the compliance rate for individuals is falling by about 0.2 percent per year. That may not seem like a large number, but over time, and given the size of the U.S. economy, it represents a real problem.

This tax cheating, Mr. President, has a dramatic impact on our budget crisis. In 1981, for example, the Federal deficit was $57.9 billion. Including off-budget borrowing programs, the total deficit was approximately $78.9 billion, still smaller than the tax gap that year of over $81 billion. What this means is that if everyone had paid the taxes they owed that year—Mr. President, a year when you and I sat in the Senate as new Members, in 1981—if everyone had paid their taxes that year, there would have been no deficit. In 1976, as I stated earlier, the effect was even more dramatic; 100 percent compliance that year would have resulted in a Federal budget surplus, instead of a deficit, and would have permitted an actual reduction in the national debt.

The tax gap raises two kinds of issues. First, there are questions involving improving compliance rates over time. Congress, in the last two tax bills, has taken a number of steps to improve compliance. Tax legislation to be considered this year, I am sure, will take additional steps to improve compliance, and increase the fairness of Federal tax laws.

Second, there are questions involving how to recover some of the missing tax revenues from prior years. The States, which have had compliance problems similar to those experienced at the national level, have undertaken a number of efforts to deal with this matter, and perhaps the most innovative of these is tax amnesty.

Eight States—Illinois, Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, Massachusetts, Missouri, North Dakota, and Texas—have tried tax amnesty periods. Illinois and Massachusetts had legislative amnesty programs; the other State programs were set up by their revenue departments or Governors.

Amnesty is a simple concept. It provides an opportunity for delinquent taxpayers to fully pay their overdue tax liability without being subject to criminal prosecution. Amnesty programs have also involved reductions, or elimination, of civil and interest penalties in order to create an incentive for taxpayers to make use of the amnesty period.

While the State amnesty programs differed in scope, extent, and many other particulars, they did have one thing in common: They were successful. They all resulted in taxpayers coming forward to pay overdue taxes who would probably have not otherwise done so. The State of Massachusetts, for example, collected over $72 million. In my own State of Illinois, collections exceeded $150 million.

Mr. President, let me tell the Senate a bit more about the Illinois experience. The Illinois tax amnesty bill was introduced by my warm personal friend, the president of the Illinois Senate, Phil Rock. At the time it was introduced, the Illinois Department of Revenue opposed it and the Illinois Department of Revenue said it could not bring in any significant amount of revenue. The sponsor himself, in the course of the debate on the subject matter, said he optimistically hoped it might bring in $100 million.

Mr. President, that bill has exceeded all expectations by every person who prognosticated upon its success. As of the latest information, it had brought in over $150 million, and when all negotiations with delinquent taxpayers are completed and all papers have ultimately been completed, the tax amnesty program in Illinois will likely bring in more than $200 million, more than 10 times what the Illinois Department of Revenue, which originally opposed it, said it would.

The State programs were not giveaways, Mr. President. They did not reward tax cheaters. The State programs increased compliance efforts and increased penalties for noncompliance after the amnesty period. The State programs resulted in placing additional taxpayers on the rolls, and in additional tax collections that the States would probably not otherwise have received.

Because I firmly believe a national tax amnesty program could be effective and ought to be tried, I introduced, on January 21 of this year, S. 203, the Federal Tax Delinquency Amnesty Act of 1985.

This bill establishes a 6-month amnesty period, to begin on July 1, or as soon thereafter as practical. The amnesty would cover all tax years through 1983 still eligible for collection efforts by the IRS—which can go back 7 years.

All taxpayers would be eligible for the amnesty, with the following limited exceptions: first, those involved with the IRS in administrative or judicial proceedings—in other words, already under investigation—before the amnesty period begins; second, those under criminal investigation where the IRS has referred the matter to the Justice Department before the amnesty period begins; and third, those who make false or fraudulent representations in attempting to take advantage of the amnesty.

The amnesty itself would be simple and straightforward. It would include amnesty from criminal and civil penalties and from 50 percent of any interest penalty owed. However, the amnesty would apply only to legal-source income. Taxes due on income resulting from criminal activity would not be covered by the amnesty.

All Federal taxes would be covered by the amnesty, not just the Federal income tax—also Social Security taxes and all of the excise taxes that are part of the great fabric of our Federal tax system.

The amnesty provisions are generous and provide a substantial incentive for taxpayers to take advantage of the amnesty period. However, the bill does not rely just on carrots, it also contains a couple of substantial sticks.

First, it increases all tax-related civil and criminal penalties, including money fines and jail terms, by 50 percent. The tougher penalties will apply to any tax year after 1984, and, after the amnesty period, to any open tax year. Of course, the increased penalties will not apply to cases pending on the date of enactment where a judgment was entered before that date.

Second, the bill authorizes such funds as are necessary to add 3,000 additional revenue agents to the IRS, an increase of about 20 percent in the agent force. This is an extremely cost-effective provision, because each additional agent brings in approximately 12½ times his salary in additional tax revenue, depending on where enforcement efforts are concentrated.

The bill also authorizes the funds the Treasury will need to administer and publicize the amnesty program. The State experience demonstrates that wide publicity can significantly enhance the effectiveness of an amnesty program.

I recognize, Mr. President, that amnesty, by itself, will not solve the fundamental problems that have led to decreasing levels of voluntary compliance with the tax laws. I know that it is equally true that tougher penalties and additional IRS agents are not enough to totally arrest the growth of the tax gap.

A comprehensive reexamination of our tax law, designed to restore the fairness that many taxpayers believe has been lost, is necessary to restore the kind of voluntary compliance that the United States has been used to and to which our country is entitled.

What amnesty will do is collect substantial tax revenues from past years that would not be otherwise collected. Increasingly, the public is convinced that the Tax Code is unfair and that many taxpayers get away with cheating. Amnesty can help reverse that perception by collecting at least part of those tax obligations. It will demonstrate that the Federal Government is a good manager, and willing to take substantial steps to obtain the taxes that are legally required to be paid.

Amnesty will benefit the honest taxpayer, because it will bring in additional revenue that could help lessen the need for further tax increases.

Efforts to restore fairness, simplicity, and equity to our tax laws are necessarily future oriented. Amnesty, on the other hand, is oriented toward past actions, or in this case, past tax delinquencies.

By bringing forward new taxpayers and those who did not fully pay their past taxes, however, the amnesty will have much more than a one-time impact. Having additional taxpayers on the rolls is a permanent benefit, and the amnesty will also help the IRS to focus its future enforcement efforts on the areas that are the most promising.

Now some may say that amnesty is unfair, and that it rewards tax delinquents. While I understand that argument, I do not find it persuasive. Amnesty is clearly more fair than not collecting the unpaid taxes at all, which is otherwise what would, in all likelihood, be the result. Amnesty, far from rewarding tax delinquents, actually collects the taxes due, together with at least some interest. Again, given the alternatives, it is hard to conceive of that as a reward.

I know, Mr. President, that this Congress will be spending a lot of time considering tax issues. I urge my colleagues to consider the role that tax amnesty legislation can play in any comprehensive tax bill. Tax amnesty has demonstrated that it can work in the States. There is no reason to believe that it will not be even more successful at the national level. I am pleased to be able to report that I have discussed this bill with my distinguished colleague from Oregon, Senator PACKWOOD, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and he has given me his assurance that the bill will be the subject of early hearings in his committee.

I have requested a meeting with President Reagan to discuss my amnesty proposal. I urge my colleagues to consider it carefully, and to join with me in an effort to see that it is quickly enacted into law. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of S. 203 and a summary of its provisions be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill and summary were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 203

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(e) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in this subsection, the amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983 (or, in the case of a tax for which there is no taxable period, taxable events occurring after such date).

(2) AMNESTY PERIOD.—At the expiration of the amnesty period described in section 2, in the case of any taxpayer remaining liable for any underpayment of Federal tax, the amendments made by this section shall apply to any taxable year (or any taxable event occurring during such taxable year) for which any period of limitation has not expired.

(3) EXCEPTION.—Paragraphs (1) and (2) shall not apply to any judicial or administrative proceeding with respect to any underpayment of Federal tax pending on the date of enactment of this Act in which a judgment was entered before such date.

SUMMARY OF FEDERAL TAX DELINQUENCY AMNESTY ACT OF 1985

(1) Amnesty period: Six-month period—July 1, 1985, through December 31, 1985, or the six-month period beginning the first July 1st after the date of enactment of the bill.

(2) Tax years covered: All open tax years ending by December 31, 1983, or taxable events occurring before January 1, 1984.

(3) The amnesty: Amnesty from criminal and civil penalties and 50% of the interest penalty owed.

Note: Exception—no amnesty for illegal source income (income resulting from a criminal offense under federal, state, or local law).

(4) Eligibility: Every tax delinquent individual or corporation is eligible for the amnesty, with the following exceptions:

(a) Those currently involved in administrative or judicial proceedings with regard to their unpaid tax liability before the date the amnesty period begins;

(b) Those under criminal investigation where the Internal Revenue Service has referred the matter to the Justice Department before the amnesty period begins; and

(c) Those who make false or fraudulent representations in attempting to take advantage of the amnesty.

(5) Taxes covered: All federal taxes, including the income tax, social security tax, and excise taxes.

(6) Increase in Tax Penalties: All tax-related civil and criminal penalties, including money fines and jail terms, are increased by 50%. The tougher penalties will apply to any tax year beginning after December 31, 1983, and to any taxable event occurring after that date. The tougher penalties are also to apply to open tax years before 1984 after the expiration of the amnesty period. The increased penalties will not apply to cases pending on the date of enactment of this bill where a judgment was entered before that date.

(7) Authorization of funds for additional IRS agents: Authorizes such funds as are necessary to add 3,000 additional IRS agents.

(8) Administration: Treasury, or its designee, is given the authority to administer the program (design forms, issue regulations, etc. . . .). Payment of taxes owed must be made during the amnesty period (except that installment payments, as in Section 2(b) of H.R. 4885, would be permitted). In cases where there is a dispute between Treasury and the taxpayer as to the amount owed, the total amount, including the disputed amount, must be paid by the end of the amnesty period. If the taxpayer is entitled to a refund as a result of the resolution of the dispute, through the normal administrative and judicial procedures, then the Treasury must refund that amount plus interest at the six-month T-bill rate in effect as of the date the dispute is resolved.

(9) Authorizations: Treasury is authorized to request sufficient appropiations to administer and publicize the amnesty program. Treasury is directed to make special efforts to publicize the amnesty program, including, but not limited to, direct-mail contacts, radio, TV, and print-media advertising. Direct-mail contact by the Treasury under this provision will not make a taxpayer ineligible to participate in the amnesty program.

REPEAL OF INCLUSION OF TAX EXEMPT INTEREST IN TAXATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS—S. 210

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I join my distinguished colleagues, Senator D'AMATO and Senator LONG, as I did last year, in their efforts to repeal the inclusion of tax exempt interest when calculating gross income for purposes of taxation of Social Security benefits.

I recall that this was a long and heated debate last year on the floor, but we were successful in passing an amendment, identical to the one we are discussing today, to the Deficit Reduction Act. As Senator D'AMATO has already mentioned, that amendment was unfortunately dropped in conference, so once again we are gearing up to correct this unfair requirement.

The current law is in need of repeal for three main reasons. First, it will inequitably affect the middle class elderly only to scrounge a few million dollars in revenues over a 7-year period. I cringe at the thought of the elderly residents in my State of Florida, on fixed incomes and barely able to make ends meet, having to include this longtime tax exempt interest in the calculation of their gross income to determine if their Social Security benefits will be taxed.

Second, this is clearly taxation on tax-exempt income. I know that during the debate last year several Senators tried to dissuade the Members of this Chamber from recognizing this fact. However, a close examination of a real-life scenario puts the argument into perspective. A Social Security recipient's benefits will be taxed if his or her income, plus half their Social Security benefits and any tax-exempt interest come to more than a given amount. Those limits have been set at $25,000 for singles and $32,000 for a married couple filing jointly.

Senator D'AMATO gave a perfect illustration of an individual earning $25,000 in income with tax-exempt interest income of $500. Obviously, when this interest is added, the individual is pushed over the threshold level. Even if one insists that this cannot be called the taxation of tax-free interest, the result and the effect is the same; the individual is required to pay taxes on Social Security benefits that he or she would not otherwise have to pay.

Finally, Mr. President, I object to this requirement because it infringes on our municipalities' ability to raise adequate capital to meet their needs. I am not talking about money to build extravagant facilities, but essential services—police, fire and school services. Florida is a growth State and the current law, if not repealed, could possibly have a dramatically damaging effect on my State's ability to meet the demands of a growing population.

Essentially, by adopting these provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act last year, Congress created an incentive for Americans to sell their tax exempt bonds, even at a discount, and in the future purchase higher yielding taxable securities. Not only does this raise the question of impairing State and local borrowing power, which is unconstitutional, but forces me to wonder why we are stripping our cities of their ability to pay for existing services during the current movement to transfer more and more responsibilities from the Federal level to the local communities.

I urge my colleagues to consider the ramifications of this legislation, and hope that they will join us in again fighting for the justice of our elderly residents and the cities of our communities.

REVIEWS OF CENTER FOR DISEASE CONTROL'S VIETNAM VETERAN/AGENT ORANGE BIRTH DEFECTS STUDY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on August 17, 1984, the Centers for Disease Control [CDC] released the results of their study on Vietnam veterans' risks for fathering babies with birth defects. After reviewing those results, I asked the Office of Technology Assessment, the science panel of the interagency agent orange working group, and the Veterans' Administration's Advisory Committee on Health-Related Effects of Herbicides to review the CDC study, provide their views on it, and make suggestions on what additional birth defects research might be indicated or appropriate.

During Senate debate on S. 1651 on October 4, 1984, I included in the RECORD my letters to those agencies, as well as several responses. Subsequently, I received a December 3, 1984, letter from Dr. John Ditzler, the VA's Chief Medical Director, updating the status of the review of this study by the VA's Advisory Committee on Health-Related Effects of Herbicides.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Ditzler's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
DEPT. OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
Washington, DC, Dec. 5, 1984.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: This will update you on the Veterans' Administration's Advisory Committee on Health-Related Effects of Herbicides review of the birth defects study published by the Centers for Disease Control.

Let me summarize briefly the chronology of this review. On August 16, 1984, one day prior to publication, we sent all Advisory Committee members an advanced copy of the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) article regarding the study. A second letter was sent to all members on August 29, 1984. This letter referred to the JAMA article previously sent, noted that the agenda for the September 12, 1984, meeting of the Advisory Committee included a presentation on the study by Dr. Joseph Mulinare, and enclosed your letter of August 15, 1984 and a related letter from Congressman Bob Edgar.

Our letter requested review of the JAMA article prior to the upcoming meeting and urged those who would be absent to send in comments. On September 7, 1984, an interim response to your August 15, 1984 letter was signed and dispatched.

On September 12, 1984, the Advisory Committee met. Dr. Mulinare briefed both subcommittees as well as the full committee on the details of the study and the results. Members made some preliminary remarks, but withheld judgment until they had an opportunity to review the full report.

On September 26, 1984, we sent copies of the full report to all members, requesting comments by October 29, 1984. A follow-up interim letter was sent to you on October 1, 1984.

Since that time, we have received several thoughtful reviews from committee members. To encourage further comments, we sent reminders to committee members on November 19, 1984.

During the next two weeks, we hope to develop a consensus statement on the study. We shall then circulate it to Advisory Committee members.

Again we regret the delay in our response to your concerns and assure you that we will provide the requested information as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

JOHN W. DITZLER, M.D.,
Chief Medical Director.

DR. DENNIS JAHNIGEN'S WORK IN GERIATRICS AT THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MEDICAL CENTER IN DENVER, CO

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the number of elderly persons in our society is growing steadily both in absolute terms and in proportion to the population as a whole. The ramifications of the increasing number of older Americans are just not being analyzed. Some have suggested that if we do not make a more concerted effort to understand and address the impact of the changes in the makeup of our population, we will find ourselves in serious difficulty in a relatively few years.

One institution that is already well embarked on studying and addressing issues relating to aging is the Veterans' Administration. The veteran population, by virtue of the large number of World War II and Korean conflict veterans, is aging more rapidly than the population in general—the veteran population is several decades ahead of the overall population; by 1990, 26.6 percent of all veterans will be age 65 or older, 37.1 percent by 2000. That's 9 million elderly veterans in the year 2000—when veterans will constitute two-thirds of all male senior citizens—as compared to about 4 million now. In view of these demographics, the VA could scarcely afford to be other than at the forefront in this area.

Mr. President, in the December 1984 issue of Esquire magazine, an article was published—"The Caretaker," by David Gelman—which discussed one of the VA's many efforts in the aging area, the geriatric clinic at the Denver Veterans' Administration Medical Center, and the clinic's head, Dr. Dennis Jahnigen. As the article points out, since becoming the Denver VAMC's chief of geriatrics 5 years ago, Dr. Jahnigen has not only built a geriatrics program which is highly regarded nationwide, but he has also become known as a sensitive practitioner—in the words of the author, a caretaker.

Mr. President, included in my bill, S. 6, introduced on January 3, is a new VA pilot program designed to keep out of institutional-care arrangements the type of ill elderly veterans that Dr. Jahnigen treats. This program is described and explained in detail in a floor statement on that bill I am making today as the ranking minority member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

So that my colleagues and the public might be made more aware of the excellent geriatrics services being provided by Dr. Jahnigen at the Denver VA facility—which I believe fairly represents many other programs and professionals within the VA health-care system—I ask unanimous consent that the Esquire article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Esquire Magazine, December 1984]

THE CARETAKER

(By David Gelman)

Reuben James waited about ten minutes before anyone spoke to him. He had somehow become separated from his wife, and I saw him standing there, at the teeming crossroads on the main floor of the Veterans Administration Hospital in Denver, Colorado, a gaunt, intact figure in a sea of crutches and casts and wheelchairs, flashing his dentures in a nervous grin, now and then running a hand through his thin, crew-cut hair.

Finally, perhaps because he was the only stationary object in all that tumultuous human traffic, the receptionist noticed him. "Can I help you?" she asked. James (names of patients have been changed) ignored her and she called out again, louder this time, "Can I help you, sir? Step over here, please." But he simply kept looking around, and that set everyone laughing, not necessarily in a malicious way but because there was something funny about his total self-absorption.

That's the way it looked. Actually, James is quite hard of hearing. He has trouble with his eyes as well, and as he searched the crowd for the face he still recognizes as his wife's he may have been feeling a touch of panic. It took a few minutes more for the receptionist to get things straightened out and lead him to the geriatrics clinic just down the hall, where his wife, a large, exhausted-looking woman with some serious medical problems of her own, soon caught up with him.

It's odd how we would, most of us, like to reach old age and yet we manage to avert our eyes from it. Even in a setting where infirmity should be the great equalizer, the old are somehow less visible, their petitions less commanding than everyone else's. Robert Butler, a former head of the National Institute on Aging, took doctors to task once for referring to older patients as "crocks" and "gomers," and many doctors still see them as a drag on their livelier interests—supernumeraries in the drama of illness and recovery.

Fortunately, the elderly have a clinic of their own at Denver's V.A. Hospital, a place where they can count on being treated as if their lives still mattered enough to be fussed over. That surprisingly rare concern is largely due to Dr. Dennis Jahnigen, the lean, windburned Ohioan who is the hospital's hardworking chief of geriatrics.

At thirty-seven, Jahnigen, who climbs mountains, cross-country skis, and backpacks through national parks on his vacations, looks almost too robustly boyish to be devoting his days to old people. In fact, he is one of the relative handful of medical doctors of any age giving serious attention to the narrow span of years after eighty, a slice of the life cycle often so fraught with ills that most other doctors tend to shun it.

In the five years since he took the assignment, he has built one of the most comprehensive and integrated geriatrics programs in the country. Small though it is, it includes a hospice unit, an evaluation unit, a patient-family advocate, and a geriatric researcher. It has a home-care team: a visiting nurse, a dietitian, and a social worker who go out a couple of times a month to monitor a patient's functioning, change dressings, put each day's medicine dosages in marked containers—anything that might keep the patient out of a nursing home. When the hospital's current construction program is completed, the geriatrics department will also have an on-site, sixty-bed nursing home of its own. And it has plans for a kind of geriatric day-care center, where outpatients can be looked after while their spouses have some relief.

DR. DENNIS JAHNIGEN MINISTERS TO THE SOULS, AS WELL AS TO THE BODIES, OF THE AGING

But what it has, especially, is the shrewd, resourceful, unflagging devotion of Dennis Jahnigen. The V.A. hospital system on the whole, with its burgeoning constituency of aging veterans, is leagues ahead of other hospitals in care of the elderly. Even so, what Jahnigen has done in Denver is unique. When he was first brought in from the hospital's outpatient service to head the geriatrics program, he found he had no secretary, no office, no staff. It was little more than an examining room. Month by month, year by year, fighting the "system inertia" of a large bureaucracy and pushing always for a little more than he had, he has squeezed substance into the program. He helped put across the idea of a three-bed "model" hospice ward with its own TV sets and microwave oven. He got funding for another doctor and the two-bed evaluation unit, secured an outside grant for a nurse practitioner-researcher, and instituted multidisciplinary team meetings to review the status of patients. "They had no idea how demanding I was going to become," he says with pardonable pride. "I've tried to push just hard enough not to be obnoxious."

At the adjacent University of Colorado School of Medicine, where he is also director of geriatrics and an assistant professor of medicine, Jahnigen has applied the same discreet but relentless pressure to expanding his departmental teaching staff and winning student converts. It is all part of the consciousness-raising effort he engages in under both hats—he has become a kind of evangelist for his discipline. In the hospital he never appears without his geriatrics name tag prominently displayed on his lab coat. ("It promotes curiosity," he explains. "There are still so few people who know about it.")

His weekly slide talks on geriatric problems are generally packed with attentive doctors and nurses, brown-bagging their lunches to hear him. During one such session, on incontinence in the elderly, Dr. Robert Brettell, a specialist in internal medicine, leaned over to me and whispered, "We're all grateful for the work Dennis is doing. The rest of us are stretched in too many different directions to focus on geriatrics."

In truth, not many doctors choose to focus on geriatrics. As little as ten years ago almost none were in the field. The tendency was to view advanced age as an accomplishment sufficient to itself. Beyond that, Jahnigen remembers, the attitude was much like that toward the dying: "You'd close the door." The doctor bias has changed somewhat since then, as the number and visibility of old people have grown. (According to Census Bureau projections, the number of Americans over eighty will have doubled, to something over five million, by the turn of the century.) But generally the geriatric specialty is still seen as a one-way street, with no hallelujahs along the way—a job for caretakers rather than healers.

Jahnigen not only welcomes the role of caretaker, but he also gives the last years of life the sort of painstaking attention that a pediatrician addresses to the first years. It is the heart of his conviction as a doctor that it is a worthwhile goal, as much as any dramatic cure in a younger patient, to get the extra mile or two of sentient, more or less independent functioning even from a ninety-year-old with a constellation of ailments. "I'm not a Pollyanna about it," he says. "But if you can keep someone home two more years, with his family, his familiar surroundings, that's a success."

Catching up with Jahnigen on an average morning is a bit like hopping aboard a speeding express train. By 9 a.m., a respectable starting time for a conscientious reporter, he has already been up and about for several hours, jogging seven or eight miles with his wife, Juanita (one of the few times they get a chance to talk), coming to the office by seven or so to make quick rounds of the intensive-care patients; phone calls and paper work till eight, clinic and regular rounds with the house staff till ten, and so on, through team meetings, slide talks, nursing-home visits, and more paper work (he is often busy applying for grants), until 7, sometimes 8 p.m.

When he arrived at the clinic on the morning of Reuben James's visit, James had already been examined by a nurse practitioner, who had also gotten a quick rundown from Mrs. James of how the patient has been doing since his last visit. At that point Jahnigen strode briskly into the room and clapped James lightly on the back, exclaiming, "How are ya, young fella?" James seemed to perk up at once, but he stared at Jahnigen craftily, without answering. "Did Barbara examine you?" Jahnigen asked, raising his voice. "She didn't have time—you walked in!" James shot back. He looked pleased with himself; he seemed to be chaffing the doctor a bit.

"How's your throat, Mr. James?" Jahnigen inquired. "Are you swallowing any better?" James tried a cautious swallow. "Not bad," he reported. "Feeling pretty good." "They x-rayed your throat, didn't they?" A brief pause. "Nope." "Didn't they take you down for X rays?" No answer. Jahnigen tried another tack: "How long have you been married?" "Too long, I'd say," replied James. "How old are you?" Another pause. "Old enough to know better." "How old did you say?" For the first time James seemed flustered, his eyes searching the room. "Seventy-six," he ventured. "Uh . . . eighty-six. "His wife spoke up wearily. "He's eighty-seven."

Jahnigen knew that James wasn't just being playful, he was being evasive. It is a typical patter in senile dementia—a patient can conduct himself with perfect poise in all the "overlearned" amenities ("How are you feeling?" "Fine and dandy. How's yourself?"), while he may be thinking, "Do I know this man? Why is he asking me these questions?" Dementia can be caused by heavy drinking, by a series of minor, sometimes undetected strokes, or by Alzheimer's disease, a degenerative brain disorder of still uncertain origins that accounts for about 60 percent of the cases. It is also overdiagnosed: its most obvious symptoms, confusion and loss of memory, may be the result of a temporary disorientation—when a patient is first hospitalized, for instance—or of the interaction of medications, or of depression, probably the most under diagnosed affliction of aging. Jahnigen is always cautious about the diagnosis. It is one the two principal reasons for admission to nursing homes—the other being incontinence—and it is far too easy to ship an elderly patient to one at the first sign of confusion.

In James's case, it was real enough. He had already forgotten his examination by Barbara Cinnan, and his visit to the X-ray room a few days earlier. At home he was experiencing a characteristic day-night confusion. He would start rattling around the kitchen, looking for breakfast, in the middle of the night, and that was placing an added strain on his wife, who had had a string of heart attacks. One midnight last winter he had sauntered out for a stroll, and before police found him about a mile away, after a frantic hour or so, his toes had almost frozen. The immediate concern was that Mrs. James was due to be hospitalized for the removal of cataracts on both eyes and would have to leave him alone. Jahnigen talked to her about the possibility of finding a hospital bed for her husband while she was in for surgery. He wasn't too hopeful; beds were scarce.

As the discussion proceeded—a boarding home for the elderly was another possibility—the patient himself seemed almost forgotten. Yet all the while he talked to Mrs. James, Jahnigen kept a hand on her husband's shoulder, massaging it gently back and forth, a gesture that I saw again and again during the week that I followed him on his rounds.

Beneath the bantering style, Jahnigen seems always sensitive to what he describes as the "precarious" situations of advanced age. A debilitated elderly couple like the Jameses, for example, may go along just managing on their own, until one of them gets sick or needs an operation, and then the whole "toothpick structure" threatens to collapse. It is very much a matter of keeping things in a kind of delicate balance, rather than making heroic interventions. "You're dealing with diseases that you can't cure," says Jahnigen, "that by their very nature mean decline." About a third of his patients have some degree of dementia, but most have more problems than that. Reuben James, besides his hearing and vision difficulties, is under treatment for a hiatus hernia, a bleeding ulcer, sinusitis, arthritis, and coronary artery disease. It is not an unusual list for the geriatrics department. On the day James came in Jahnigen saw an eighty-five-year-old veteran, Mr. Coleman, who was suffering from renal insufficiency, hypothyroidism, congestive heart failure, degenerative arthritis, peripheral neuropathy (a loss of sensation in the extremities), and anemia, not to mention the acute diarrhea brought on by one of the medications he was taking. With such a patient there are often critical decisions to be made: Is he responding well, or is he in a downward spiral? How aggressively should he be treated? At what point does aggressive medical care merely prolong an intolerable life, as opposed to extending his capacity to function acceptably?

Jahnigen had been angered that week (as had half the country, apparently) by some remarks by Governor Richard Lamm of Colorado implying that ailing old people have an obligation to get out of the way and make room for the young, instead of clinging to life-support devices and making unreasonable demands on the medical system. What particularly outraged Jahnigen was the typical lumping together of all the aged, as if there weren't wide differences in their "quality." The lists of diagnoses often don't tell the story, Jahnigen explained. "You could have a single disease—a metastatic cancer, let's say—and your quality of life could be miserable. On the other hand, when Mr. Coleman is in good balance, when his medicines are adjusted, his quality is quite good."

During the week, as we moved about among some gravely ill patients, I asked Jahnigen if he didn't find it depressing at times to be working so much in the shadow of decline and death. I realized later that the question reflected the very bias against the old that we had been discussing, but he seemed used to it. "You know," he said, "I could do this same sort of thing in cardiology and have no impact. Here it makes an enormous difference just to get a flu shot into an eighty-year old, say—that's like giving inoculations in the Third World. Anything you do is an enormous stride."

Jahnigen had mentioned one day that one of his favorite books was Sinclair Lewis's medical fable, "Arrowsmith," a novel he rereads about every four years. I hadn't read it since high school, and when I looked at it again I was surprised to find that Martin Arrowsmith's priorities seemed the opposite of Dennis Jahnigen's. Arrowsmith didn't have much enthusiasm for bedside doctoring he was "wild" for the romance of the laboratory for finding ultimate truth among the test tubes. For Arrowsmith, the real romance of medicine was to wipe out disease, not to "just tinker at a lot of worn-out old bodies, but make a new world."

Yet I came to see that Jahnigen, tinkering at all those worn-old bodies, is in his fashion as much a rebel as Arrowsmith. It took a certain single-mindedness, after all, to choose a branch of medicine that many of his contemporaries view with undisguised distaste.

At the time Jahnigen started advanced training in primary-care medicine, after graduating from the Ohio State University School of Medicine, most of the young doctors he knew were going in for the high-tech glamour specialties—cardiology, oncology, immunology, and the various surgical subspecialties. But he had found a role model, and a real-life hero, in the person of Dr. Raymond Rowberg, director of medical education at Sacred Heart Hospital in Spokane, where he had signed up for a one-year internship (after a three-month mountain-climbing expedition in the Yukon). Jahnigen says he chose the "more humanistic" setting of a private hospital because he felt the academic teaching centers were overemphasizing science and technology and neglecting the basis business of caring for people. Rowberg, he says, was the finest physician he had met to that point in his training, a doctor who could keep up scientifically and yet never lost sight of his primary responsibility to patients. He was also the first doctor in Jahnigen's experience who seemed to care genuinely about old people, while too many others seemed all to willing to consign them to nursing homes. "He tried to alter medicine to serve old people and not warehouse them," Jahnigen reverently recalls. "He showed me that just because they're old doesn't mean they can't benefit from good medical care. I would say he was a geriatrician before there were any."

When Jahnigen finished his internship Rowberg asked him to take over his practice while he went off to Tanzania to found a hospital and medical school. It was a dream of an assignment for a fledgling medic. For a year he took care of Rowberg's patients, lived in his house, sat on his committees. Then he took two more years of training at the University of Washington before he was recruited by Denver's V.A. Hospital, where (as it always seems in restrospect) his destiny as a doctor lay.

Jahnigen is optimistic about what he sees as the growth of humanistic values in medicine. In the past five years or so, he says, there has been a trend back to primary care among graduating students. Last year, for the first time, he had a student whose declared specialty was geriatrics; this year, he notes with satisfaction, there are four or five. "They're the critical element," he said. "You wanna change anything, you change the student."

At dinner one night Jahnigen talked about his father, who worked his way up from pole climber to telephone company manager, who did beautiful cabinetry as a hobby and had looked forward to retirement, when he would be able to give full time to it, and who was now, at sixty-four, a big, powerful man of six feet two inches, so disabled by rheumatoid arthritis that he couldn't even handle a screwdriver. Jahnigen's interest in geriatrics predated his father's debility, so there was only a coincidental connection there. But with obvious pride, he told me something else: his father had been involved with the Boy Scouts all his life, and this year he was to be recognized for fifty years of dedicated service. I was interested to hear that, because in the early Sixties, when I worked for the Peace Corps as an evaluator of overseas programs, I had got the impression that the best volunteers, the ones who worked most uncomplainingly, and even happily, at what they were supposed to do, were those who grew up in families with some tradition of church or community service. That's where I had seen it before, the sort of clean, unselfish energy that kept Jahnigen going around the clock, helping people and thinking constantly about how he could help them more. It occurred to me that he would have made a terrific Peace Corps volunteer.

But he has found his own underdeveloped country to work in. Martin Arrowsmith and his fellow microbe hunters helped make a new world of very old people who were then left in it to fend for themselves. Dennis Jahnigen's achievement is the promulgation, in a small but effective way, of the idea that attention must be paid to these, the eldest but not the least of our brethren. As he summed it up himself, "Basically, we've made the elderly special here. And everybody who's involved with them has to treat them as special, or recognize that they deserve a little extra attention."

BAN ON CREDIT CARD SURCHARGES—S. 212

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 212, legislation to place a permanent ban on credit card surcharges. I supported this effort in the 98th Congress and am hopeful that the Members of this Chamber will support passage of this important and necessary legislation this year.

In my State of Florida, a credit card surcharge could have a devastating impact on the No. 1 industry in the State; tourism. Millions of Americans visit the Sunshine State for their family vacation, and few pay for their expenditures in cash. It is not only inconvenient to carry the amount of money necessary for a family of four to vacation for 1 week, but it is also dangerous. Any person carrying that much cash is a moving target for those individuals who prey on vacationers. I do not believe that we should penalize those who choose to utilize a safer and more convenient method of payment which is essentially the effect of a credit card surcharge.

Although the impact on Florida would be significant, this is by no means a regional issue. It is estimated that 7 out of 10 households have at least one credit card. Consumers in every State of this Nation use credit cards, and not only for vacation purposes. Many families purchase television sets, meals and clothing on their cards. Elderly citizens rely heavily on their use either because they do not have the cash available at the time of purchase or they are afraid to carry cash.

Merchants also benefit from credit cards. They increase volume and profits, and they cut costs of keeping cash on hand, maintaining charge accounts and cashing bad checks. If this legislation is adopted, the merchant would retain the option to offer a cash discount which is a far superior method of passing on any costs of credit card use to those actually making the purchase by credit card.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. It is a fair and equitable solution and will protect the majority of consumers in this Nation who have chosen to use credit cards as a safe and convenient method of payment.

HONORING JACK WOOD

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, tomorrow leaders from prominent labor, construction, political and other community organizations will gather to recognize the contribution made by Jack Wood to the quality of life of working people throughout Metropolitan Detroit and around the Nation. In an industry sometimes disrupted by strife and disorder, Jack Wood has served as a peacemaker and organizer. While I could at length describe his accomplishments, let me instead include in the RECORD an account from the Detroit Free Press of Jack Wood's accomplishments. I join with thousands of other admiring Michiganders in wishing him well earned retirement.

I ask unanimous consent that the material to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUILDING PEACE—UNIONIST HAS MADE CAREER OF AVOIDING, SOLVING DISPUTES

The record of Jack Wood's union leadership is written in the concrete and steel of a dozen buildings we all know on sight.

There's the soaring grace of the American Natural Resources Co. Buildings on Woodward and Jefferson.

There are Cobo Arena and Cobo Hall in the Civic Center and Detroit's main post office on Fort Street.

There's the Renaissance Center shining by the river and the stadium in Pontiac with its floating fabric Silverdome.

"Yeah," said Wood on Friday in a deep rasp as a reporter listed the structures. "That's ours."

When Wood says "ours," he's referring to workers in unions—specifically unions led by him.

There also are 100 lesser-known buildings Wood helped in the building of. Detroiters live, work and study in them daily without a thought of the men who worked to build them.

Being able to set the workers—craftsmen such as carpenters, ironworkers and painters from as many as 75 local unions—to pull together to set jobs done without labor strife is the strength Wood brought to his work as secretary—manager of the AFL-CIO's Greater Detroit Buildings and Construction Trades Council.

"He has certainly left his mark," said Stan Arnold, leader of the state buildings trades council.

Wood is to retire in early February after 50 years in the construction industry. For the last 20 years, he led the local council, made up of workers from Monroe to Port Huron.

According to Wood's colleagues in the union and among building contractors, his legacy is that of a peacemaker.

The crusty union activist with the deep, raspy voice learned peace the hard way—as a frontline soldier in the construction industry's labor warfare.

Born and raised on a farm in West Branch, Wood later lived in Clare and became a carpenter in 1935 when he was 16. In 1942, he joined the carpenters union and built hangars at Willow Run.

In 1954, at the urging of friends, he ran for business agent of his local union, Carpenters Local 674. He was elected leader of the council in 1965.

"I thought I would run once, get beat and that would be the end of it," he said last week. "Instead I won. I got caught up in it and I've been here ever since."

In the years after World War II, there was bitter fighting between labor and management in the construction industry, and there were battles between rival craft unions.

In addition, each of some 28 craft unions bargained separately with 18 or more contractors.

In 1970, Wood and his management counterpart, Stan Veighey, labor relations director for the Detroit chapter of Associated General Contractors, set out to find a solution to the strife.

It came after two years of disastrous battles and work stoppages that culminated in a 95-day strike.

"The strike was the costliest in Detroit area history," said Veighey, who retired last year. "The workers lost. The employers lost."

Because of weariness and need for labor peace, Veighey said, he and Wood were able to persuade all 18 employers and 28 unions to bargain a single contract.

When the contract expired in 1972, Wood and Veighey did it all over again.

The feat so astounded other trades groups and contractors that Veighey and Wood often took to the road, explaining their "multitrades agreement" to industry leaders from Washington, D.C., to Honolulu.

"We tried to do away with major strikes. They were so wasteful. So many people got hurt—contractors and union members both," Wood said.

Said Arnold: "At the time, bringing all the trades in to bargain together was an innovation. Certainly that helped stabilize the construction industry throughout the country."

In 1975, when the Wood-Veighey team was instrumental in the drive to complete the $136 million Silverdome on time for a Lions opener, the public and politicians alike sang the praises of the labor relations marvel.

It almost seemed to prove a point at a time when contractors using non-union labor were competing with unionized contractors such as those in the Associated General Contractors.

It's a point that Wood—union man first, last and always—frequently makes.

But it was Floyd Whalen, the superintendent for Barton-Malow, the project's general contractor, who paid unionized builders the supreme compliment on the date of the completion of the Silverdome.

"Open shop (non-union) guys could never have done this job," he said.

EXTENDING DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on Tuesday along with my distinguished colleague from Rhode Island, Senator CLAIBORNE PELL, I introduced S. 240, a bill to extend daylight saving time [d.s.t.] by approximately 2 months, commencing on the first Sunday of March following enactment.

As my colleagues know, under existing law, the Uniform Time Act of 1966, we presently observe d.s.t. from the last Sunday in April until the last Sunday in October, a period of approximately 6 months.

Under our bill, d.s.t. would begin nearly 2 months earlier, on the first Sunday in March and end on the last Sunday in October, a period of approximately 8 months.

There is wide public support for this bill as well as many advantages to its passage.

Studies done by the Department of Transportation support the concept of 8 months of d.s.t. With additional daylight hours, the Department of Transportation predicts that energy consumption, traffic fatalities, and violent crimes will all decrease.

Mr. President, this bill has the potential to save American consumers as much as 100,000 barrels of oil per day for the 2 months each year of extended daylight saving time. Though the present world "oil glut" has diminished the attention on the need for conservation, oil remains a finite resource of which our supply is limited. Each year we could reduce our oil consumption by approximately 5.6 million barrels by adopting this legislation.

As a result of this huge energy savings, utility ratepayers would save more than $130 million at current oil prices.

We have included in this bill several provisions to avoid any possible adverse effects from extending d.s.t. The bill would preserve the option of any State to be exempt from d.s.t. And it would give the Federal Communications Commission power to grant broadcasting exemptions to certain AM-only radio stations which might otherwise lose their right to broadcast during the profitable early commuter hours, since some stations may presently broadcast only after sunrise.

Mr. President, the history of daylight saving time legislation in the Congress makes a strong case for the prompt enactment of this bill.

In 1973, Congress passed the Emergency Daylight Saving Time Energy Conservation Act authorizing a 2-year experiment with year-round d.s.t. beginning in January 1974.

Because that approach extended d.s.t. through the winter months, requiring children to go to school in the dark, there was considerable opposition to it. Our bill does not require children to go to school in the dark. The light conditions for the period in the springtime—essentially the months of March and April—during which this bill would extend d.s.t., are at least as favorable as those which exist in September and October, during which we now have d.s.t.

During October of 1974, in response to concerns about children expressed by both the general public and the Department of Transportation, year-round d.s.t. was repealed. It was subsequently replaced by Public Law 93-434, providing for 8 months of d.s.t. beginning on the last Sunday in February—a week earlier than this bill—and ending on the last Sunday in October, as S. 240 does. Like our bill, that legislation enabled us to use available daylight much more efficiently.

Public Law 93-434 unfortunately expired in April 1975, returning us to a 6-month d.s.t., although in the 94th Congress, the Senate passed 70 to 23 S. 2391, providing for d.s.t. on a 7-month basis.

The House of Representatives failed to enact the 7-month plan, and it died when the 94th Congress ended.

Similar legislation was again introduced in the 96th Congress, but did not receive hearings because the Department of Transportation was late in indicating its support for the bill.

In the 97th Congress, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 4437 an 8-month d.s.t. bill, by a vote of 243 to 165. H.R. 4437 was similar to the bill I introduced in the 98th Congress, S. 63, which never reached the Senate floor, although it received committee hearings.

In the 98th Congress, the House considered 8-month d.s.t. legislation similar to the present bill. This bill failed to pass by a 12-vote margin, 199 to 211, after adoption of a controversial amendment permitting those States opting for d.s.t. to choose either 6 or 8 months of daylight saving time. With this option, Members correctly perceived that we would have returned to the confusing system where each State kept its own time.

Mr. President, as one who enjoys the benefits of the present d.s.t., I want to explain how our bill will improve the situation, consistent with common and scientific sense.

The amount of daylight we derive on a given day from the Sun results from the constant tilt of the Earth's axis, as it revolves around the Sun. This tilt changes the length of daylight hours, causing the seasons.

On March 20 the vernal equinox, and on September 21 the autumnal equinox, the light of the Sun just reaches from one pole to the other. The Sun is directly overhead at the Equator, and days and nights are equal all over the globe.

In the Northern Hemisphere, the vernal equinox begins spring just as the autumnal equinox beings fall.

The amount of daylight increases about 2 minutes each day from March 20 until June 21, the summer solstice, when the North Pole is most tilted toward the Sun. As a result, June 21, our traditional first day of summer, is the longest day of the year.

Each day after June 21, we have roughly 2 minutes less daylight until the winter solstice, December 22, the shortest day of the year, when the light of the Sun falls well short of the North Pole.

Under present law, using 1985 as an example, daylight saving time will commence on April 28, the last Sunday in April, and end on October 27, the last Sunday in October. But on April 28, the hours of daylight are far longer than on October 27. Our bill is designed to take advantage of the available light in March and April, just as present daylight saving time uses the light available in September and October.

Mr. President, our bill errs on the side of caution. It does not change the ending date for daylight saving time, which this year will be October 27, at all. Nor would it move the starting day for daylight saving time all the way to February 12 when light conditions equivalent to those on October 27 will exist.

Rather it merely changes the starting date of daylight saving time to the first Sunday in March, in 1985, that would be March 3. The hours of daylight on March 3 will be the same as those on October 2, and the morning daylight hours start far earlier than on October 27.

If daylight saving time makes any sense at all, as a vast majority of people believe, then S. 240 perfects the existing situation to take advantage of daylight we are presently wasting.

Mr. President, I hope that hearings will be held promptly and S. 240 adopted promptly.

REINTRODUCTION OF EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT—SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 10

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today to join as a cosponsor of the equal rights amendment. The reintroduction of the ERA in the 99th Congress marks the beginning of a new campaign to pass and to ratify this all-important amendment to our Constitution.

Though ratification by the requisite 38 States fell just 3 States short in 1982, we are proud of our commitment and of our efforts in obtaining for women what is necessary and just. We must remind ourselves, however, of the difficulty the women of this Nation had in obtaining the right to vote and we must not give up the fight. When the 15th amendment to the Constitution was passed and ratified, women, who were some of the most vigorous supporters of abolition, were left behind. They had to carry the fight for another 50 years before they, too, gained the right to vote. Women at that time and now do not seek special treatment; they seek basic justice and freedom. They seek only equal rights as individuals and citizens under law. As those who before tried and persevered so must we here today persist until we gain the basic rights for all the citizens of our Nation.

As a father I have watched with great pleasure as my children, sons and daughters, have grown to their majority. As any parent in this body, I have taken great pride in them and have done my best to love, nurture, educate, and in general prepare them for what the future holds. But, I did not raise my daughters to accept the mantle of limited citizenship. I want for my daughters the same as I want for my sons—the opportunity to rise to the highest level their ability will take them.

Unfortunately, this opportunity does not now exist. Women in this country suffer inequality in economic opportunities. Today, nearly 60 percent of America's women work outside the home. Yet, it is a fact that women are paid less and promoted less. In my State alone, women are paid about three-fifths to two-thirds what men make. And, it is with much regret that I point out that women with college educations earn less than men with 9th and 10th grade educations. With more and more women beginning to work outside the home—most for reasons of economic necessity—this startling and blatant discrimination will only become worse unless we do something to bring about change.

The vehicle for change is the equal rights amendment. It is the most powerful tool to obtain equal pay and equal opportunity for the women of this Nation. Admittedly, much progress has been made since the equal rights amendment passed Congress in 1972, and was sent to the States for ratification. Much of this significant progress came in anticipation of the passage of the amendment. And, these are accomplishments in which the whole Nation should be proud. But the truth remains that there is much to be accomplished. Today the preservation of fundamental rights is dependent on legislation, executive action, and interpretation by the courts. The unfinished work must be completed. The full rights of citizenship must be accorded to the majority of Americans. We must make the equal rights amendment a part of the U.S. Constitution, and I pledge my continuing support in gaining its passage and ratification.

ARMAND HAMMER CALLS FOR UNITED STATES-SOVIET SUMMIT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, few analysts of United States-Soviet relations have more experience and greater understanding of the issues which divide us than Armand Hammer. Armand Hammer's knowledge of the evolution of United States-Soviet relations over the past many decades has been gained first hand and has provided important insights for American leaders as we pursue efforts to reduce the tensions between Washington and Moscow.

I therefore read with great interest Armand Hammer's recent article in the Los Angeles Times calling for a prompt summit meeting between the American and Soviet leadership. I strongly support this proposal and commend Armand Hammer's article to my colleagues' attention.

I ask unanimous consent that this article "It's Time for a United States-Soviet Summit Session," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 27, 1984]

IT'S TIME FOR A UNITED STATES-SOVIET SUMMIT SESSION

(By Armand Hammer)

The death of the Soviet Union's defense minister, Marshal Dmitri F. Ustinov, clearly strengthens the power of President Konstantin U. Chernenko, and in my opinion makes a summit meeting between Presidents Reagan and Chernenko within the first six months of this year even more imperative.

During 63 years of dealing with the leadership of both superpowers, it has been my experience that nothing can take the place of the two top men exchanging views face-to-face. I compare it to the meeting of two "bosses" in a business deal: When one sits down with the other, and they trash out the general parameters of an agreement, it is then the responsibility of those who are below them to put their efforts into the task of making the details work.

In recent years summitry has too often been under the control of aides rather than leaders, and has also been delayed too many times, for one reason or another. This is a loss to all people who, as the polls consistently show, have a great fear of nuclear war.

Yet summits do work, especially when the leaders are at the height of their powers. That is certainly the case with Reagan and Chernenko. A good example is the meetings of Presidents Richard M. Nixon and Leonid I. Brezhnev in Moscow, Washington and San Clemente. Sitting quietly together, without assistants other than interpreters, they trashed out the major paragraphs of the breakthrough SALT agreement. At that time both men were powerful, and they knew how to use their power.

Conversely, President Jimmy Carter, despite the urging of myself and others, waited a year or more longer than he should have before meeting with the sick and aging Brezhnev in Vienna in 1979. The SALT II treaty that they negotiated was a good one, but Carter's power was beginning to dwindle and the treaty could not be ratified—even though there was a Democratic majority in the Senate.

Furthermore, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan angered Carter, who was poorly advised to retaliate with the grain embargo when he should have sat down with Brezhnev and negotiated a Soviet withdrawal. Brezhnev told me at the time that he would be willing to do so if the United States would guarantee against a hostile anti-Soviet government being set up along his southern border. Pakistan's President Zia ul-Haq told me that he was willing to work this out, but Carter's advisers turned him against the idea.

Brezhnev's health and subsequent death put detente on the shelf, and the window that had been opened was rather rapidly closed. I believe, however, that the window is now open again. I cannot say how long it will remain open, but I think the timing has to begin in 1985.

Chernenko, whom I met for an hour-and-a-half recently in Moscow, is at the height of his power. He is from the Brezhnev mold—one of the last of the leaders who remember the horrors of World War II—and is anxious, as the capstone of his career, to initiate a step backward from nuclear confrontation.

The death of Ustinov, a hard-liner, further consolidates Chernenko's power. I found Chernenko in better health than I had been led to expect, and our conversation, which was conducted in Russian and lasted longer than originally planned, flowed freely, constantly touching on the need for a better understanding and relationship.

Chernenko mentioned the treaties signed by three former American Presidents that have never been ratified, and suggested that one result of the summit might be some action on those treaties taken by the Republican-controlled Senate. He recognizes the potential difficulties, however, and also said that he would meet to sign a simple agreement worked out between himself and Reagan stating the policy of no-first-use of nuclear weapons.

I believe that Reagan, with his strong personality and ability to persuade and working through Secretary of State George P. Shultz, could enlarge on this and create a communique calling for no-first-use of any force, including conventional and nuclear. Such a basic document could then be used by the principal negotiators, Shultz and Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko, for detailed development.

I feel that the President has picked the right man for this historic moment in Shultz, who has a unique understanding of the issues involved. I also believe that the President has been wise in continuing his policy of a strong defense. I am not one of those who dream that better understanding will come overnight.

But everything that I know about both Presidents, and the policies of both countries, tells me that this great opportunity for a summit early in 1985 must not be lost. If the leaders meet and generally agree, then the rest of the negotiations can fall into line. What a gift that would be to the people of this world, who have lived too long with an insecure feeling about the future.

JACKIE STRANGE: FIRST WOMAN DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise to offer my congratulations to Ms. Jackie Strange on her appointment as Deputy Postmaster General of the United States. She is now second in command at the Postal Service and she holds the highest post ever held with the Service by a woman.

My staff and I have had occasion to work with Jackie Strange in her previous role as Regional Postmaster General for the agency's 11-State southern region. We appreciate both her competence and her courtesy in assisting us on behalf of our constituents.

As a fellow southerner, I note that she hails from Georgia, which is a neighboring State to mine. So, as a neighbor, I welcome her to Washington.

As a member of the Senate Subcommittee on Civil Service, Post Office and General Services, I welcome her managerial skills as the chief operating officer of the Postal Service. She will be responsible for the work of 702,000 employees at 39,000 facilities throughout the country. I know she will handle her duties well, since she has a proven record supervising 23 percent of the Nation's mail service in the southern region.

I ask unanimous consent that a U.S. Postal Service news release and an article from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKIE STRANGE NAMED FIRST WOMAN DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Jackie A. Strange, Regional Postmaster General for the 11-state Southern Postal Region, has been named Deputy Postmaster General of the United States, the number two job in the U.S. Postal Service.

The announcement was made by John R. McKean, Chairman of the Postal Service's Board of Governors, in Washington, D.C. on January 8.

In her new position, Ms. Strange, a Georgia native, will hold the highest rank ever held by a woman in the Postal Service. She had also held that same distinction as Southern Regional Postmaster General, headquartered in Memphis, Tenn., a position she held from February 1983 to the present.

She will succeed Jim Finch, who announced his resignation as Deputy Postmaster General effective February 15, after serving in that capacity since June 1, 1983. Ms. Strange's appointment is effective February 16.

As Deputy Postmaster General, Ms. Strange will be a member of the Postal Service's Board of Governors and its alternate chief executive officer. She will serve as the Postal Service's chief operating officer, helping to guide the activities of some 702,123 employees in 39,000 postal facilities throughout the nation. The five Regional Postmasters General will report directly to her.

Jackie Strange entered the Postal Service in 1946, while still a student at Georgia Southern College. After her graduation, she taught high school English and coached girls' basketball, continuing to work at the college post office during the summers. During her career she has served in a number of positions: acting postmaster, finance branch superintendent, organization specialist, organization officer, acting post office and delivery services division director, customer programs manager, acting director of customer services, acting district manager, general manager of customer programs and district manager.

Before being named Assistant Postmaster General for the Procurement and Supply Department at postal headquarters in October 1981, Ms. Strange was District Manager of the Kentuckiana Postal District, headquartered in Louisville, since 1979. Prior to that she held several management positions at the Southern Regional Headquarters in Memphis.

Ms. Strange received her B.S. degree in education from Georgia Southern College and did graduate work at Georgia Southern, the University of Virginia and Columbia University.

She has received many Postal Service awards and citations, including the Postal Career Executive Service Special Achievement Award. In 1982, Ms. Strange was named to the World's Who's Who of Women and honored as a Distinguished American Penwoman.

She has two sons, Danny of Phoenix, Arizona, and Nick of Durham, North Carolina.

WOMAN NAMED TO NO. 2 POSTAL SERVICE JOB

Postmaster General Paul N. Carlin yesterday named Jackie Anderson Strange deputy postmaster general, the No. 2 job in the U.S. Postal Service and the highest post ever held there by a woman.

Strange has served as regional postmaster general for the agency's 11-state southern region since 1983. She began her postal career in 1946 at the student post office at Georgia Southern College, where she earned a bachelor's degree in education.

As head of the southern region, Strange has supervised 23 percent of the nation's mail service. She replaces Jim Finch, who will resign Feb. 15.

As deputy postmaster general, Strange will be a member of the postal Board of Governors and oversee the agency's day-to-day affairs as chief operating officer of the agency, which employs 702,000 workers at 39,000 facilities.

S. 2 THROUGH S. 10—EXPLANATIONS AND DESCRIPTIONS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 3, the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD), graciously introduced on my behalf nine bills, S. 2 through S. 10, inclusive. Today, I will share with my colleagues some background pertaining to each of these measures and a description and explanation of the provisions of each of the bills.

S. 2: OLDER AMERICANS EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES ACT OF 1985

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 3, my bill S. 2, the proposed "Older Americans Employment Opportunities Act of 1985", was introduced. This legislation is based upon similar legislation I introduced during the 97th and 98th Congresses. This measure, designated as S. 2 during the 98th Congress and as S. 3010 during the 97th Congress, contains a number of provisions aimed at encouraging older workers to remain in the work force, particularly in part-time positions, and at stimulating employers to make employment opportunities available to older workers. Two of the proposals from my original legislation—increasing the social security delayed retirement adjustment factor and modifying the social security earnings limitation—were enacted in the Social Security Amendments of 1983, Public Law 98-21. Accordingly, on August 3, 1983, I reintroduced the remaining provisions of S. 2 as separate bills, S. 1751, S. 1752, and S. 1753. The current bill once more draws together the provisions of these three separate bills.

NEED FOR NEW POLICIES REGARDING OLDER WORKERS

Mr. President, each year, thousands of older workers are forced out of their jobs or discouraged from continuing to work because of a variety of policies, fiscal disincentives, myths, and stereotypes. Demographic data, however, make it clear that we must begin now to revise and reform the policies and practices which have been used to discourage these older workers, deny them the opportunity to remain active participants in the economic life of the Nation, and, in many cases, force them into unwanted dependency and idleness. There are two important reasons why this must be done.

First, America is aging. In a few short decades, the number of Americans over age 65 will constitute fully one-fifth of the population. In 1980, 1 in 9, or 24 million Americans were 65 years or older, compared to 1 in 12 in 1950. This population will increase only moderately over the next 25 years, but soon after 2010 its size will grow dramatically. It is projected that by 2030, nearly 1 in 5, or almost 56 million Americans will be 65 or older.

Second, despite persistently high rates of unemployment in the 1970's and 1980's, we will soon be entering an era of labor-shortages, when the number of new, young workers entering the work force will be declining. It is predicted that the number of 18- to 24-year-old entrants into the work force will fall by 15 percent in the next two decades, largely because of the drop in births during the 1970's. As the number of young workers declines, our labor force will need to retain the experienced older workers that our society now forces into retirement.

Moreover, there is every indication that the new job slots that will need to be filled in the years ahead will be ones that are ideal for older workers. According to available employment projections, 74 percent of the increase in employment slots in the next two decades will be in wholesale or retail sales and in service industries—two industries which currently employ 60 percent of all workers age 65 or older. These data also indicate expanded opportunities for part-time employment for older workers over the same period since those same industries and occupations projected to have the largest increased future employment needs are frequent users of part-time employees.

Finally, Mr. President, every public opinion poll conducted in recent years has demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that an overwhelming percentage of older workers would like to continue in the work force beyond the normal retirement age of 65. A significant majority of these older workers indicate that they would like to have the option of part-time work. For example, a 1981 Harris poll found that 79 percent of workers between the ages of 55 and 64 said they would prefer part-time work to complete retirement. Surveys of those already retired demonstrate an equally strong desire to continue to work, particularly in part-time positions.

Although economic factors play a role in some of these responses, the desire to continue in the labor force is consistently expressed even when an adequate retirement income is present or assumed. It is clear that older Americans appreciate and seek the noneconomic benefits of employment—the sense of vitality and productivity that comes from continuing as active participants in the labor force.

Despite these data relating to the desires on the part of older workers to continue working in some fashion, their labor force participation has been steadily declining. Between 1950 and 1980, the portion of those 65 or older in the labor force fell from 24 percent to 13 percent.

The cause of this continual decline of older workers lies in part with the retirement and employment policies that discourage their remaining in the work force.

Mr. President, it is clear that this Nation is going to need the skill of older workers in the labor-scarce years ahead. It is equally clear that many older workers want to stay in the work force, particularly in part-time employment. And it is just as clear from the standpoint of the Social Security System and Federal tax revenues that the Nation would benefit substantially from their continued employment. Our task should be to remove the obstacles, policies, and practices which currently drive out of the work force those older workers who want to continue working.

REEVALUATING AND REVISING RETIREMENT CONCEPTS

Mr. President, in order to meet the challenges that lie ahead, it is imperative that we begin now to reevaluate and revise our basic attitudes toward retirement. Retirement today means a total, abrupt withdrawal from the labor force. One day, an individual is engaged as an active, contributing worker; the next, he or she is faced with a total retirement—complete exclusion from the workplace. This often has a severe, deteriorative impact upon physical and psychological health, taking away from many older Americans that sense of fulfillment and self-sufficiency which comes from productive employment. Retirees are generally left with a loss of meaning and worth in their lives and often without sufficient resources to maintain an adequate standard of living.

We should begin to foster a new perspective on retirement, a shift from the concept of an abrupt, total withdrawal from the labor force to one of gradual withdrawal, where older workers are afforded the opportunity, if they choose, to reduce their work pace, shift to less demanding work roles, or participate in more flexible work schedules. Part-time employment, in particular, represents an appealing and practical way for older workers to remain in the work force, contributing their skills and experience and supplementing their incomes, yet still allowing them to reduce their workpace.

This new concept—sometimes called phased-retirement or gradual retirement—would not only serve the interests of older workers, but it would also help meet the future needs of the labor force. As I indicated earlier, much of the increase in new employment in the next two decades will be in fields that frequently use part-time employees.

Mr. President, because it is clear that older workers today desire these part-time work arrangements, a number of the provisions in my proposal are focused upon encouraging part-time employment opportunities for them.

Efforts to develop new models of retirement options are already beginning as some leading corporations throughout America have initiated programs that capitalized on the skills and experience of older workers and promote hiring practices and work patterns that accommodate the needs and desires of these workers.

Hearings over the past several years in both the Senate and House have documented the extent to which major American corporations, such as Xerox, Polaroid, G.E., Grumman Aerospace Co., the Bank of America, and the Travelers Insurance Co., have begun developing innovative ways of providing employment opportunities for older workers. Travelers Insurance Co. provides an excellent example. After learning that 85 percent of its employees over 55 were interested in some kind of paid employment after retirement, the company established a retiree job bank, offering flexible work options to retirees—options include temporary work, either part or full time, from 1 day to 6 months or more; part-time permanent jobs, either 5 part days or several full days a week; and job sharing in which two or even three retirees share the same full-time job. In order to encourage retirees to work, Travelers changed its pension benefits to provide that retirees can work for the company 960 hours a year—nearly half time—with no reduction in pension benefits. Travelers has found the program of benefit to both the retirees and the company as it retains the services of experienced employees. Out of the average of 60 temporary positions to be filled at Travelers headquarters each day, 55 of those positions are filled by retirees familiar with the work. However, the companies experimenting with these innovative approaches have expressed concern about the continuation of certain Government policies which hinder and impede the development of these new concepts.

NEED TO REVISE GOVERNMENT POLICIES WHICH HINDER FLEXIBLE RETIREMENT POLICIES

Mr. President, success in implementing an older worker's employment policy and reversing the existing restrictive concepts of retirement depends in large part upon American employers voluntarily accepting and promoting this new approach to older workers. As I noted, many of our leading corporations are starting to propose and implement these new policies.

But this task cannot be successful unless we begin, at the Federal level, to revise those Government policies that encourage early retirement, discourage delayed retirement, and inhibit employers from developing the types of flexible work arrangements that older workers need in order to encourage them to stay in the work force.

For example, until the passage of the 1983 Social Security legislation, the Social Security System—the major retirement program for the vast majority of Americans—contained several serious disincentives to continued work for older Americans. The adjustment schedule for early and delayed retirement—the basis for computing benefit levels—was tilted to encourage early retirement. I had proposed in S. 3010, when it was first introduced in 1982, to change the adjustment schedule so that those workers who remain in the work force after age 65 would receive an actuarially fair adjustment in their ultimate Social Security benefit levels to reflect these additional work years.

Similarly, I had included in the initial version of this measure provisions to modify the Social Security earnings limitation. Prior to the 1983 amendments, a Social Security recipient under the age of 70 who continued to work, would have lost $1 in benefits for every $2 earned over the exempt amount, set at $6,600 in 1983. That was the equivalent of a 50-percent tax on the additional income. When this 50-percent tax was added to the Social Security payroll tax imposed upon earned income, to the Federal income tax, and to possible State and local income taxes, it could run up to a tax rate over 70 percent on earnings above the $6,600 limitation until the entire Social Security benefit was forfeited.

The 1983 amendments included changes along the lines I had proposed, providing gradual raises in the delayed retirement adjustment factor to an actuarially fair rate and modifying the earnings limitation to provide the loss of $1 for every $3 in earned income, rather than for each $2. The increases in the delayed retirement adjustment factor from the current 3 percent per additional work year to 8 percent per year will be phased in between 1990 and the year 2008. The change in the earned income limitation will also take effect in 1990. These changes should help substantially in making continued work more desirable to older Americans.

There is, however, much more that can and must be done to reduce other obstacles and fiscal disincentives that discourage older workers and their employers. S. 2 seeks to deal with many of the other remaining problems.

DESCRIPTION OF S. 2

Mr. President, as I indicated in my opening remarks, the legislation I am introducing today is a comprehensive proposal aimed at eliminating the obstacles and disincentives which tend to discourage employers from providing employment opportunities for older workers and discourage the older workers themselves from staying in the work force. The proposed Older Americans Employment Opportunities Act of 1985 deals with a number of Federal laws relating to these issues, and I would like to describe the various provisions contained in this measure.

ELIMINATION OF MANDATORY RETIREMENT

Mr. President, the first step that must be taken to encourage older workers to stay in the work force is elimination of mandatory retirement.

Forcing older workers out of their jobs at some arbitrary age is an archaic, discriminatory, and unreasonable policy. It is a policy that robs society of the contribution and productivity of an increasingly important segment of our work force, and it robs these individuals of the dignity and self-sufficiency which comes from working. In 1978, we began to deal with the issue of mandatory retirement by abolishing it for Federal workers and by raising the age from 65 to 70 for most other workers. I supported the 1978 measure as an interim step toward total abolition of mandatory retirement. It is time now to finish the work we began in 1978 and to eliminate once and for all the mandatory retirement policies that force workers out of their jobs at an arbitrary age.

Section 101 of S. 2 would eliminate the age 70 provision as well as the two exemptions contained in the 1978 legislation which denied tenured college professors and certain business executives the full protection of the statute.

Mr. President, the 1978 amendments to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act [ADEA] also directed the Department of Labor to conduct a study to determine the impact on both older and younger workers and upon employers of raising the mandatory retirement age from 65 to 70 and to determine the probable impact of total abolition of mandatory retirement. The report of the Department of Labor estimated that raising the retirement age from 65 to 70 would result in over 250,000 older workers being able to stay in their jobs. This represents a 5-percent increase in the total older work force. The report estimated that another 200,000 would continue working if mandatory retirement ages were abolished altogether. This report also contains some very interesting data on the impact upon women, minorities, and younger workers of retaining older workers in their jobs. As my colleagues may recall, in 1978, the argument was made that raising the retirement age from 65 to 70 would adversely affect employment opportunities for younger workers, women, and minorities. Those arguments were forcefully rebutted by the testimony of a number of groups, such as the National Organization for Women and the National Caucus on the Black Aged, which pointed out that women and minority group individuals have a special interest in seeing the elimination of mandatory retirement since they often have the least resources in their retirement years; hence forced retirement often means relegating them to an existence below the poverty level.

Mr. President, the Department of Labor report is particularly important because it conclusively and finally lays to rest the spurious argument that we must deny employment opportunities to older workers in order to protect other groups of workers. The final report concluded that there was no significant job slot competition between older workers likely to continue in the work force and those other categories of workers. The 1981 interim report submitted by the Department of Labor had presented data supporting that conclusion which showed that the additional over-65 workers would be potential competitors of less than one-quarter of 1 percent of all full-time workers aged 16 to 24; of less than one-half of 1 percent of all full-time black workers aged 16 to 59; and of around one-tenth of 1 percent of all full-time female workers aged 16 to 59. The interim report also had cited studies indicating that even a substantial increase in labor force participation by workers over age 65—such as a 10-percent rise—would have insignificant impact upon the employment and promotional opportunities for younger workers. The Department's final report concluded by recommending that mandatory retirement be prohibited.

Mr. President, elimination of mandatory retirement policies will give older workers the option—I stress, the option—of continuing in the labor force rather than being forced to retire when they reach some fixed chronological age. An older worker's abililty to perform a job and the desire to continue working—not his or her birthdate—should be the determinative factors in retirement decisions. Elimination of mandatory retirement at a specified age is an essential prerequisite to the development of a comprehensive policy to encourage older workers to stay in the labor force.

Mr. President, during the last Congress there were several proposals pending in the Senate to remove the age 70 ceiling in the ADEA. S. 2 differs from other measures which were before the Senate in the last Congress in that it would also abolish the exemptions created in 1978 that deny certain categories of workers protection against mandatory retirement rules. In 1978, over my strong objections, exemptions were included in the ADEA to allow colleges and universities to force certain employees—tenured faculty members—to retire at age 65 and to allow businesses to take the same actions with regard to certain executives.

The exemption for universities and colleges, however, expired on July 1, 1982. Thus, under the ADEA today, college professors enjoy the same protections against mandatory retirement before age 70 that every other worker enjoys. Some of the proposals introduced in the 98th Congress would have recreated an exemption that would allow universities and colleges to force out tenured employees when they reach age 70. These proposals would also have allowed continuation of the exemption for businesses which choose to force executives with pension benefits over a certain level to retire when they reach 65.

My bill does not exclude any category of employees from the protection of the ADEA. I recognize that those employers who seek to retain the freedom to discharge an employee when he or she reaches a certain age truly believe that the circumstances in their particular field warrant special consideration. But, Mr. President, we are dealing with what is a basic civil right—the right to be judged on the basis of individual ability to perform a job. Employment discrimination on the basis of chronological age is just as invidious and unfair as the discrimination on the basis of race or sex or religion or national origin that title VII of the Civil Rights Act prohibits. It has no place in our society.

Some of the proponents of these exemptions claim the need to hire new blood to get new ideas into higher education or into their corporate offices. The presumption, however, that younger individuals have a monopoly on new ideas is simply an outdated ageist stereotype. There are countless examples of major breakthroughs in the sciences, art, literature, music, and other fields which have come from those individuals over the normal retirement age.

Mr. President, if we believe as a matter of principle that no American should be forced to retire at a set age without regard to individual competency—and that is the view held by most Americans—then there is simply no justification for carving out particular work force segments for which such protection will not be provided.

The ADEA clearly does not limit an employer's ability to discharge any employee, regardless of age, who cannot adequately perform his or her duties. That ought to be the standard in every occupational field, not some arbitrary age factor.

Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent that an article which appeared in the Chronicle of Higher Education discussing some of the issues associated with the tenured-professor exemption be reprinted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

PENSION DISCRIMINATION

Mr. President, it is estimated that one-half of the male retirees and one-third of the female retirees between 1979 and 1982 were eligible for a private pension. Discrimination in private pension plans against older workers is among the various factors which tend to discourage older workers from continuing in the work force.

There are two ways in which a number of private pension plans discourage continued work past a set retirement age: First, many plans provide that an employer can refuse to credit the additional work years after retirement age to an employee's pension; and, second, many plans provide for a total forfeiture of pension benefits if an employee continues working beyond a minimum amount in a particular industry or for a former employer.

According to a report published by the Congressional Budget Office, Work and Retirement Options for Continued Employment of Older Workers, July 1982, 27 percent of the workers covered by private pension plans are subject to provisions that prohibit accrual of pension benefits entirely after the normal retirement age, and 22 percent are in plans that limit in some fashion pension benefit accrual after a particular age. Under these plans, if a worker continues to work after the normal retirement age, he or she gets no or reduced additional pension credits for those additional work years. In effect, the older worker is denied this fringe benefit that younger workers receive automatically. The Department of Labor estimates that elimination of this private pension plan discrimination against older workers would keep close to 70,000 more men in the work force after normal retirement age. No estimates were available on the number of female workers likely to continue working if these desincentives were eliminated.

Section 102 of S. 2 would deal with this problem by amending the ADEA to state clearly that it is unlawful to treat older workers differently from younger workers with respect to the accrual of pension benefits. A companion amendment contained in section 201 would prohibit plans under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act [ERISA] from containing this type of discrimination.

Mr. President, I am delighted to report that on June 26, 1984, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission [EEOC], which in July 1979 assumed jurisdiction over the Age Discrimination in Employment Act [ADEA], voted to rescind the rule which had been adopted by the Department of Labor with respect to this issue. According to a letter I received from Phyllis Berry, Director of EEOC's Office of Congressional Affairs, the Commission's action in rescinding the previous interpretation was based upon the following beliefs of the Commission: First, that the former interpretive provisions were not consistent with the stated purposes of the ADEA; second, that a new rule regarding post-normal-retirement age pension contributions which comport with the legislation history and purpose behind section 4(f)(2) of the ADEA is desirable; third, that the Department of Labor's 1979 interpretation, which permitted the cessation of pension contributions, appeared inconsistent with the Department of Labor's administration interpretation of section 4(f)(2); and, fourth, the Department of Labor's reliance on portions of the 1978 legislative history of ADEA in promulgating its 1979 rule permitting the cessation of pension contributions was misplaced. The Commission has indicated its intention to publish a new proposed rule in the Federal Register for public comment.

Mr. President, I very much support the EEOC's stated intention to revise the restrictive rule published in 1979 which allows employers to cease accrual of pension benefits and share the view that the existing rule is inconsistent with the purpose of the ADEA. I congratulate the Commission for its vision, and I look forward to reviewing the new rule. In the meantime, however, I have included in my legislation provisions which would overturn the existing rule.

Mr. President, the second type of disincentives contained in private pension plans involves provisions requiring total forfeiture if an individual continues to work for the same employer or in the same industry after he or she becomes eligible for pension benefits. Prior to 1982, a pension could be withheld for any amount of work by a pensioner. According to one estimate, there are about 66,000 pensioners between the ages of 65 to 69 who did not work because of these forfeiture of benefit rules. Current Department of Labor regulations permit some work activity by pensioners but allow all benefits to be withheld from retirees who work more than 40 hours per month in prohibited employment.

Section 202 of S. 2 would prohibit an employer from withholding pension benefits so long as the pensioner did not work more than 1,000 hours per year. This is roughly twice the current allowable amount and would enable a retiree to work approximately half-time before losing his pension.

Mr. President, I want to stress again that what we are trying to achieve is increased flexibility and opportunities for older workers to stay in the work force, particularly part time. We are rapidly approaching an era when our society is going to need the skills and contributions of these older workers. These part time employees will be able to contribute to our national productivity, continue to be taxpayers, and increase their own standards of living in old age through continued work effort.

PART-TIME EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVES

Mr. President, a major purpose of this legislation is to promote the availability of part-time employment opportunities for older workers. Older Americans have repeatedly indicated that they are desirous of these part-time employment opportunities. In addition to the provision permitting part-time work without losing pension benefits which I just described, there are several other provisions in this legislation designed to have specific impact upon part-time employment opportunities.

First, S. 2 would provide for cutting in half the FICA tax—commonly known as the Social Security payroll tax—imposed upon both the employee and the employer for workers over age 65 with respect to wages that do not exceed one-half of the contribution and wage base established under the Social Security Act—presently $39,600 per year. Under current law, the employer is obligated to pay the full FICA tax for each employee, regardless of the fact that the employee may be part time. Thus, an employer faces a situation where the FICA tax on two part-time employees will exceed the tax which would have been paid to one worker performing the same job.

For the older worker, having to pay the full employee FICA tax on part-time employment creates an additional fiscal disincentive, particularly if the employee is already subjected to the Social Security earnings limitation. There have been proposals made to eliminate entirely FICA taxes on workers over 65. Consideration has also been given to providing for a pro rata reduction in the FICA tax. However, the administrative difficulties in applying a pro rata reduction would be enormous. Hence, section 302 of S. 2 would simply cut the FICA tax in half for older workers and their employees for wages up to one-half of the applicable contribution and wage base provided under the Social Security Act.

Second, section 301 of this legislation would extend the existing targeted job tax credit to low-income older workers. As I will explain in a moment, this would result primarily in the creation of part-time jobs for older workers.

The targeted job tax credit provides employers with a tax credit equal to 50 percent of the first $6,000 in wages paid in the first year to workers in certain targeted categories, and 25 percent of the first $6,000 paid in the second year of employment. Between 1979 and 1981, 800,000 workers were benefited under the existing targeted categories which cover persons who are economically disadvantaged and are one of the following: 18- to 24-year-old, Vietnam-era veterans, former convicts, youths aged 16 to 19 in cooperative education programs, former CETA public service employment participants, vocational rehabilitation referrals, or welfare assistance recipients.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that 1.5 million older workers between the ages of 62 and 69 and 2.6 million who are 70 years and older would be eligible under the same income standards that are applied to the other categories under the existing credit. Costs of extending the credit to low-income older workers could range between $50 million per year in reduced revenues if 2 percent of the 1.5 million used the credit to $250 million if 10 percent used the credit. However, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that this cost would be partially offset by increased Social Security revenues ranging from $7 to $25 million, by increased income taxes paid by the employee, and reduced Social Security benefit payments resulting from the work effort of these new employees.

Mr. President, obviously, this proposal is made in the context of the existing tax code which already contains a targeted jobs tax credit. By introducing this provision as part of S. 2, I do not intend to suggest that I would necessarily advocate this type of tax credit in the context of a modified flat tax reform or other tax simplication reform.

The Congressional Budget Office has also indicated that because of the combined effects of the Social Security earnings limitation and the $6,000 limit in the existing offset for employers, the likely effect of extending the TJJC to this group would be primarily to create jobs paying under $6,000, likely to be part-time jobs. Thus, this provision would contribute to stimulating the availability of the part-time employment opportunities that older workers have repeatedly indicated they desire.

APPRENTICESHIP PROGRAMS

Finally, Mr. President, section 401 of the proposed Older Americans Employment Opportunities Act of 1985 includes a provision amending the National Apprenticeship Act in order to prohibit age discrimination in apprenticeship programs. A great number of apprenticeship programs which recruit entrants into the skilled trades apply upper age limits for aspiring workers. These policies reflect an attitude toward the productivity and longevity of older workers that is inconsistent with the demographic changes ahead in our work force. As the demand for older workers grows and older workers look at second careers, age barriers in apprenticeship and other job training programs must be reevaluated. A worker in the year 2000 is as likely to spend as many years in the work force after his 45th birthday as before that age. In many cases, older workers will be needed to transfer from heavy industrial jobs to lighter tasks. They will need to have access to training programs to make these transfers. Elimination of age discrimination in apprenticeship programs is one of the steps that should be taken as we attempt to reorient our attitude toward older workers.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I believe that S. 2 represents a comprehensive approach to expanding the employment opportunities of older Americans who want to stay in the work force in some fashion after the normal retirement age. The changes which have taken place in our society and will continue to take place in the coming decades demand that we discard our existing rigid concepts about retirement and replace them with a flexible range of options that will meet the needs of older workers, of American business, of our economy, and of our society. I hope that action can be taken on these proposals to help eliminate the obstacles that deter older workers from remaining in the work force. Public opinion and desire clearly point in this direction. We need to make a firm commitment to action. I intend to write to the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Finance Committee and the Select Committee on Aging urging them to hold hearings on this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of S. 2 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks followed by the article from the Chronicle of Higher Education.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXHIBIT NO. 2

"I WASN'T READY TO GO": THE CONFLICT OVER FORCING PROFESSORS TO RETIRE

(By Suzanne Perry)

Five years ago, Saul Levine, then a professor of art history at Fairleigh Dickinson University, turned 65.

It was a traumatic experience.

For although Mr. Levine loved teaching, he was being forced to give up his tenured position because he had reached the age for mandatory retirement under a faculty contract with the university. The university then appointed him to a nontenured position for one year and offered him only a part-time job for the year after that.

The professor says he was so unprepared to pull back from his life's work that he felt as though he had been stricken by "emotional leukemia."

One day you're at peace with yourself, he says, and then "suddenly there is the restraint of serious illness, and very little can be done about it. You have to accept the reality of a status that is brutally changed."

Mr. Levine did what he could: He sued the university on charges of age discrimination, and won—mainly because the university, in stripping him of his tenure, left itself open to a judgment that it had violated the federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Ironically, until last July, that law protected nontenured faculty members—but not tenured faculty members—after age 65.

Under the terms of Mr. Levine's settlement, however, he had to leave Fairleigh Dickinson at age 69.

"I wasn't ready to go," he says. "I considered myself at the peak of my teaching abilities. I'm a Michelangelo scholar, and the interaction between teaching and scholarship is always there. You can't separate it."

Mr. Levine says his leave disrupted the lives of others, as well, as evidenced by letters that many colleagues and students sent to administration on his behalf.

Mr. Levine's legal battle is over now, but the philosophical questions surrounding mandatory retirement still tug at him. Is it morally right, he asks, for an employer to require workers to retire against their will?

Mr. Levine says No.

"Retirement in a democratic society has to be voluntary," he says. "Any arbitrary imposition of retirement is a violation of our civil rights. It's something ugly. It's anathema. It violates our basic sense of decency."

BURGEONING MOVEMENT

Throughout American society a burgeoning movement against age discrimination is forcing people to confront such issues these days.

In academe, however, there are special complications, because leading professional associations have said that tenured faculty members should be treated differently from other employees. Others disagree. The arguments reflect a classic conflict between the rights of individuals and the needs of institutions.

Five years ago, when the Age Discrimination in Employment Act was amended to prohibit mandatory retirement before age 70, colleges and universities were temporarily exempted—until July, 1982—in the case of tenured professors.

This year, Rep. Claude Pepper, Democrat of Florida, one of the nation's leading advocates of rights for older Americans, and Sen. John Heinz, Republican of Pennsylvania, introduced bills to abolish mandatory retirement altogether. But once again, under their proposals, application of the law to tenured professors would be delayed—this time for 15 years.

The exemption is the product of intensive lobbying by the American Council on Education on behalf of all major higher-education associations, reportedly augmented by hundreds of letters to Congress from college and university presidents.

The institutions' arguments, basically, is that "uncapping" the retirement age for tenured professors would exacerbate demographic pressures that have already sharply reduced the number of openings for new faculty members across the country. Confronted with projections of declining enrollments and a bulge of middle-aged faculty members who were hired during higher education's boom period of the 1950's and 1960's, college and university officials say they must be able to retire older professors.

No other profession, they say, must grapple with the intricacies of academic tenure, which makes it difficult to fire an unproductive professor. Moreover, the "graying" of college faculties will lead to increased salary costs and a lack of fresh blood, the officials maintain.

AAUP SUPPORTS EXEMPTION

On the surface that might seem to be strictly a management viewpoint. Yet the proposed 15-year exemption is also being supported by the American Association of University Professors, which opposed a faculty exemption in 1978 but now fears that uncapping the retirement age altogether could freeze out younger faculty members from the tenure system.

Said the association's Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure in a report published last fall:

"An effect of uncapping legislation, though one probably not consciously intended by its framers, will be to shift institutions' total personnel costs toward the older edge of the faculty age spectrum, as many professors elect to stay on at full salary, past the traditional mandatory retirement age of 70 at many institutions, as well as past the previously traditional retirement age of 65 at many other institutions."

Matthew W. Finkin, professor of law at Southern Methodist University and chairman of the A.A.U.P. committee, says the association's concern extends to "the vitality of the professoriate as a whole."

Officials of the association say its position has attracted little negative response from members.

But in other corners of academe, there are ripples of discontent.

For one thing, the two other major faculty organizations—the American Federation of Teachers (A.F.L.-C.I.O) and the National Education Association—oppose the exemption. The N.E.A. opposes mandatory retirement for any workers, and it argues in a letter to Congress that excluding tenured faculty members from legislative protection would be "double discrimination—once on the basis of age and again on the basis of occupation." The A.F.T. has not taken a position on the general question of mandatory retirement, but it says that any legislation on the issue should afford tenured faculty members "treatment comparable to other professionals."

For another thing, some faculty members and administrators passionately believe that forcing competent professors to retire involuntarily is as unjust as discriminating against someone on the basis of race or sex.

"WORST FORM OF DISCRIMINATION"

"In some ways this is the worst form of discrimination," says Allen D. Calvin, professor of organization and leadership at the University of San Francisco. "If we're lucky enough, all of us will get to be 65 or 70, so this will affect all of us."

Mr. Calvin has launched a one-man campaign against mandatory retirement. For years, he has been collecting documents, writing letters, contacting Congressional staff members, and lobbying in California for a pending state bill that would prohibit forced retirement of professors.

He sees those efforts as a logical extension of his own involvement in the civil-rights movement. While retirement will not affect him directly for some time—he is only 55—Mr. Calvin says he was moved to act after watching some of his former colleagues become "absolutely destroyed" by mandatory retirement.

"The more I watched some of the finest professors I knew being fired, the more irritated I got," he says.

Another opponent of mandatory retirement is Thomas M. Stauffer, now chancellor of the University of Houston. Until last summer, he was director of external relations at the American Council on Education, one of the leading advocates—both in 1978 and today—of allowing colleges to force tenured professors to retire.

Mr. Stauffer's view, which he explained in a recent letter to the New York Times, is that academe is inviting greater federal intervention by asking the government to exempt it from "fundamental national policy."

"American higher education is part of the American nation, not separate from its basic social trends," he wrote. "The American population is aging, and recognizing the value of older workers is just as significant as recognizing the value of women and minorities in the work place."

Mr. Stauffer says he sympathizes with the A.C.E., which was flooded with letters from college presidents who opposed raising or uncapping the mandatory-retirement age for tenured professors. But he says he couldn't shake the feeling that their arguments were discriminatory.

"I thought what A.C.E. was doing in a constituent sense was correct—representing the people in higher-education land," he says. "But I thought it was wrong, pure and simple."

J. W. Peltason, president of the American Council, says its position serves the needs of the entire higher-education community. "In all fields, one needs a balance of younger faculty and more experienced faculty to stimulate students and colleagues alike by challenging old as well as new ways of thinking and by contributing varied perspectives," he told Congress in a letter.

On the other side of the question, Bernard Roth, professor of mechanical engineering at Stanford University, is an example of someone who became "converted" by considering the individuals involved. He says he began fighting mandatory retirement after investigating the issue about five years ago as chairman of Stanford's A.A.U.P. chapter.

"My mind literally got blown," Mr. Roth recalls. "Every stereotype I had on the issue was wrong."

He says he discovered that instead of "doddering guys with yellow notes," many of the Stanford professors who were being forced to retire were "stars who were bringing in millions of dollars" that created jobs for young scholars.

Mr. Roth testified against a California bill, which eventually passed, that exempted tenured professors at private universities from state legislation abolishing mandatory retirement. And he led a fight on behalf of Stanford professors who were in what he calls the "window group"—they turned 65 between the time Congress amended the mandatory-retirement law and the time the exemption affecting tenured professors expired. Stanford agreed to offer the affected employees half-time assignments.

Opponents of mandatory retirement in higher education also raise these points.

There is no evidence that many professors would stay past 70 even if they could, so predictions of dire consequences from uncapping the retirement age may be exaggerated.

Colleges and universities are using mandatory retirement as a way to rid themselves of unproductive professors, instead of dealing directly with a problem that can afflict faculty members at any age.

Some professors can't afford to retire because their pensions are inadequate.

The argument that hard data on mandatory retirement do not exist is supported by a Congressional staff member who is closely involved with the pending legislation.

"I find it kind of curious that the supposed scientific and academic leaders of this country are running around screaming Chicken Little stories," he says.

Although the bills' sponsors agreed for political reasons to include the 15-year exemption, this source adds, "it will be up to the academics to prove their case to Congress."

According to the Teachers Insurance Annuity Association and College Retirement Equities Fund, the average age at which faculty members begin collecting their pensions—which usually represents a retirement date—has been declining over the past 10 years. In 1982, the organizations report, 10 per cent of their participants began receiving annuity checks at age 70 or over, compared with 12.5 per cent in 1973.

The report by the A.A.U.P.'s academic-freedom committee said academe should be exempted from proposals to uncap the retirement age for tenured professors "so long as the professoriate is otherwise fairly treated in the administration of the institution's retirement plan."

Mr. Finkin defends the committee's positions as a highly principled one. The academic-freedom panel considered the civil-liberties argument carefully, he says, and "the question was a close one."

But on balance, the committee believed that its position served the greater good. The prospect of unlimited employment of faculty members, he says, could cause administrations to attack the tenure system.

Furthermore, mandatory retirement is a "civilized" way to ease out a faculty member who, "after 30 years of service, is not as productive as he once was," Mr. Finkin adds. "One of the advantages of mandatory retirement is it is neutral."

Mr. Peltason of the A.C.E. agrees that the prospect of charging older professors with incompetence—and perhaps fighting the battle in court—is unappealing.

"You'd have letters from students of 20 to 30 years ago, saying, 'He was the best thing in my life.' Then the university has to come forward and say, 'Yes, Professor X was a fine biochemist, but he hasn't done anything up to date in the last 10 years.' "

Meanwhile, as the debate continues, individual lives are directly affected by colleges' decisions on retirement. While many professors undoubtedly look forward to retiring, for some the experience is wrenching.

Gifford E. McCasland, for example, in 1978 and 1979 waged a bitter fight through his faculty union against his forced retirement at age 65 from the University of San Francisco. Because of the 1978 exemption, however, he had no legal recourse. Mr. McCasland, a former professor of chemistry, found that a bitter pill to swallow.

"To single out any one occupation and deny you the protection of the law—I think it's an outrage," he says. "To me, it's unconstitutional. I don't know how they get away with it."

The outrage also extended to Mr. McCasland's wife, Evelyn, who says it was difficult to watch her husband become the victim of discrimination for the first time in his life.

For several years, the McCaslands were consumed by the mandatory-retirement issue. They wrote letters, clipped and filed dozens of articles about retirement, and monitored efforts to change the California law.

But, they say, they eventually gave up hope that anyone was listening. Mr. McCasland found a part-time research position at the University of California at San Francisco, but the bitterness lingers. Mrs. McCasland says they refuse to attend the annual emerti dinners of the University of San Francisco.

In a final effort to state his case, Mr. McCasland wrote an article that he hoped Newsweek would print on its "My Turn" page. The article, which has not been published, was entitled "Professors—On the Scrap-Heap at 65."

S. 3: SOCIAL SECURITY EQUITY ACT OF 1985

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 3, my bill, S. 3, the proposed "Social Security Equity Act of 1985," which is identical to legislation I introduced in the past two Congresses—S. 3 in the 98th Congress, and S. 3034 in the 97th Congress—was introduced. This measure would incorporate the concept of earnings sharing into the Social Security system. I am pleased to be joined in sponsoring this legislation by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART] and the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN], the ranking minority member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging. S. 3 is almost identical to a proposal, H.R. 158, which was introduced in the House on January 3 by Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR. She is the chair of the body's Select Committee on Aging's Task Force on Social Security and Women and has been a tremendous leader in the effort to reform the Social Security System in a manner that would adequately and equitably deal with the needs of older women. Representative OAKAR has also introduced this legislation in the House in the past several Congresses and, as I will discuss in a few moments, we have worked closely together in seeking to move forward in this area, as well, I might add, as on pay-equity legislation, S. 5, also introduced on January 3.

Mr. President, the basic concept underlying earnings sharing is relatively simple: Marriage for Social Security purposes should be and would be regarded as a partnership. In order to compute benefits, all of the earnings of a married couple would be combined and divided equally between the spouses upon retirement or divorce. Each member of the couple would then have established for him or her an individual Social Security account. Earnings acquired before or after a marriage would go into this individual account along with whatever share each member acquired during marriage.

Mr. President, to understand the need for reform, it is necessary to understand the conditions of poverty and dependency which face millions of older women in our society and how the present system of determining Social Security benefits contributes to these and other problems.

OLD AGE AND POVERTY

Poverty in this country among the elderly is principally a problem afflicting women. Although women constitute 59 percent of the total noninstitutionalized aged, they account for more than 70 percent of elderly poor. In 1983, more than 2.6 million older women had incomes below the poverty line. The poverty rate of elderly women was 17 percent in 1983, compared to the 10-percent rate for older men. For unmarried elderly women—it was a staggering 28.7 percent.

A 1984 report issued by the Women's Research and Education Institute of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, "Older Women: The Economics of Aging," succinctly summarizes the data which explain, in part, the reasons for this disproportionate representation of women among the elderly poor.

ELDERLY WOMEN LIKELY TO BE DEPENDENT ON SOCIAL SECURITY

First, Mr. President, women are far more likely than men to be almost totally dependent upon Social Security for income in their old age. Since Social Security was never intended to meet all of the financial needs of a retiree, Social Security alone seldom provides more than a marginal standard of income.

In 1982, only 19 percent or less than one in five older women had any income from pensions and/or annuities, and only 13 percent of the unmarried elderly women received private pensions in contrast to 33 percent of married couples and 24 percent of unmarried men. Typically, these private pension benefits were low, especially those received by women who retired after years of working at low paying jobs or by women who, as surviving spouses, received reduced benefits from their deceased husband's pension plans.

Interest from assets, such as savings, provide only a minor source of income for many elderly persons, particularly for unmarried elderly women. In 1982, for example, the median income received by elderly persons from all assets amounted to only $1,540.

The importance of Social Security to elderly women is demonstrated by the fact that, according to the 1982 data, nearly three-quarters of all unmarried women are dependent on Social Security for at least half of their total income and for almost 40 percent of them it represents 90 percent or more of their total income. For 1.7 million of these women, Social Security represented 100 percent of their income. In contrast, only 17 percent of married couples and only 27 percent of unmarried males relied upon Social Security for 90 percent or more of their income.

As I will discuss in a moment, this dependence upon Social Security as the major source of their income by elderly women—especially elderly women living alone—when combined with the generally lower Social Security benefits received by these women is a key factor in the disproportionate representation of these women in the poverty population.

ELDERLY WOMEN LIKELY TO LIVE ALONE

Second, Mr. President, elderly women are far more likely than elderly men to be living alone in their old age. Ony 40 percent of elderly women live with their husbands and about 20 percent live with other people—mostly family members, and more than 40 percent live alone. Among women over age 75, the percentage living with a husband drops to less than one-fourth and the percentage living alone increases to nearly one-half. These statistics and the likelihood that a woman will be alone in old age arise from higher male mortality rates coupled with the tendency of men to marry younger women. An elderly man is far more likely to be living with a wife: 7 of every 10 men aged 75 and older is living with a spouse while nearly 7 of every 10 women is a widow. Even at the younger ages, the difference in marital status is striking. Of those between age 65 and 74, almost 40 percent of the women are widowed compared to less than 10 percent of the males. Remarriage rates for these men are vastly higher than for women. As I indicated earlier, those elderly women living alone are far more likely to be poor than elderly women living with a spouse.

WOMEN'S SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS LIKELY TO BE LOWER

Third, although so many elderly women living alone depend upon Social Security as their principal and sometimes only source of income, their benefits are dramatically lower than the average benefits received by men. In 1982, nearly 4.5 million women were receiving Social Security benefits as widows based upon age (rather than because of disability or presence of dependent children). Their benefits averaged $379 per month which, if it were the only or primary source of income wasn't much in 1982. Another 3 million beneficiaries were wives of retired workers receiving a dependent spouse average monthly benefit of $213. In the event that these wives become widows, their monthly benefit would double to $416. The picture for divorced wives was even bleaker. Their benefits averaged $177 a month. For retired workers, the average benefit for women in 1982 was $335; for men, $438. The average for all adult women was $308; for men, $430.

ELDERLY WOMEN PREDOMINATE IN NEAR-POVERTY STATUS

Finally, although the disproportionate poverty status of elderly women frequently has drawn the most attention because of its staggering nature, the situation is equally grim for millions of elderly women just above the poverty line—$4,770 for individuals 65 and over in 1983. As of 1983, older women had a median personal income of $5,599 compared to the median income of $9,766 for older men. When the median income figures are broken down to show income distributions, an even more grim picture emerges. Forty-five percent of these women, or nearly one in every two had incomes of less than $5,000 in 1983; less than one in five men fell into this category.

Mr. President, in every income category—whether it is private pensions, asset income, or Social Security—older women have dramatically fewer resources and less income in old age than do men. There are, of course, many factors which contribute to the economic hardships that face women in their retirement years. A lifetime of wage discrimination and pay inequities contribute enormously to these problems in old age—and there is a real need to do something further about eliminating those factors—the goal of the proposed "Pay Equity Act of 1985," S. 5, which I mentioned earlier. But there is little question that a major contributing factor lies in the failure of the present Social Security benefit structure to take into account the changing roles and needs of American women.

HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

Mr. President, much of the problem lies in the fact that the Social Security System was developed in an era when the role of women in our society was far different from what it is today. In the 1930's when the Social Security Program was created, the typical American family consisted of a man who was a full-time worker and his wife who was a full time, lifelong homemaker. The labor force participation of married women was less than 17 percent and fewer than 1 in 12 marriages ended in divorce. The Social Security benefit structure was thus established on the concept of a lifelong couple with one wage earner and a dependent spouse.

The situation has dramatically changed over the past 50 years and the typical family of the thirties and forties—even the fifties and sixties—is not the typical family of today. Women have become a major part of America's work force, enriching the world of work with their contributions and productivity, despite continuing wage discrimination and employment barriers. The percentage of married women in the work force exceeds 50 percent and it has been estimated that 90 percent of all women spend some portion of their lives in the work force, many of them moving in and out of the roles of wage earners and homemakers as the needs of their families change. It is no longer true that women are likely to be either lifelong homemakers or lifelong wage earners; these roles are combined and interchanged throughout a lifetime.

Similarly, we must recognize, like it or not, that the status of marriage has changed dramatically over the past 50 years. Today, one of three marriages ends in divorce.

Mr. President, despite these massive changes in our society, the Social Security System has continued to operate on the basis of a philosophy designed for an era when most women did not work and when most women were part of a lifelong marriage. Consequently, the current system works well only for that very small number of women whose family and work patterns have not changed from the 1930's and 1940's. For the vast majority of women and families that no longer fit into that pattern, the system fails to provide either adequately or equitably for their needs.

CURRENT BENEFIT STRUCTURE

Under the current system, a woman can receive benefits as a covered worker based upon her own earnings record or she can receive benefits as a dependent wife, widow, or ex-wife of a covered worker, but she cannot receive both benefits. If she is entitled to both a worker's benefit and a dependent spouse's benefit, she received only the higher of the two benefits and loses the other.

DEPENDENT SPOUSE BENEFIT

A dependent spouse benefit is equal to 50 percent of the benefit of the working spouse. Because many women have gaps in their work history due to absences from the workplace for childcare responsibilities and generally have much lower earnings records, many find that their benefits as a dependent spouse are greater than the benefits they would be entitled to receive on the basis of their own work history. Thus, many married women who enter the work force and make contributions to the Social Security System find that their years of work and contributions make little or no difference in their benefit levels. They are no better off than if they had never worked and never paid into the Social Security System.

DIVORCED OR WIDOWED SPOUSE BENEFITS

Mr. President, the inequities of the current system can be even more acute for those women who have been full-time homemakers and are displaced from that role either by divorce or the death of a spouse. After years of work as a homemaker in a marriage, a divorced woman may find herself without any work record of her own and eligible for Social Security benefits only as a dependent spouse. Although she may be of retirement age, she can not receive any Social Security benefits unless the marriage lasted 10 years. Until enactment of the 1983 Social Security Amendments, she could not receive benefits until her former spouse reached age 62 and if he elected to continue working, she would receive no benefits at all until he retired or died. Fortunately, that particular inequity was corrected in the 1983 legislation, allowing these women of retirement age with at least a 10-year marriage to receive benefits regardless of whether the former spouse continued working.

However, the benefits received by a divorced spouse are likely to be woefully inadequate. The level of the dependent spouse benefit—50 percent of the primary benefit—was geared toward the notion of women whose marriages do not end in divorce and who will be able to rely upon a combination of their husband's 100 percent benefits and the additional 50 percent spouse benefit—in other words, 150 percent of the primary benefit. The spouse benefit by itself may well be insufficient to live on alone.

A widow is equally vulnerable under the present system. Unless she has been able to establish a sufficient Social Security account in her own name, she will be dependent upon the work and earnings record of her deceased spouse. Unable to build up sufficient credits in her own account and unable to add his credits to her account to the extent of her earnings after his death, she is likely to be left with a benefit level that condemns her to entering retirement in poverty.

ONE WAGE-EARNER VERSUS TWO WAGE-EARNER FAMILIES

The current system also discriminates against intact families with two wage earners as contrasted with one wage earner families. Under the benefit calculation formula, a two-earner couple is likely to receive less benefits at retirement than a one-earner couple with exactly the same lifetime earnings. Thus, one family with average monthly earnings of $1,000 and one wage-earner can ultimately receive higher benefits from Social Security than another family with the exact same average earnings but with two wage earners contributing to the total family income. This occurs because of the dependent spouse benefit and because of the formula which is used to calculate benefits.

The 1979 HHS report, "Social Security and the Changing Roles of Men and Women" (page 32) described this problem as follows:

> Since spouse's benefits are not payable to two-earner couples (unless one spouse has low average indexed monthly earnings (AIME)), a two-earner couple generally receives lower total benefits than a one-earner couple with the same total AIME. Benefits for two-earner couples with the same AIME can also vary dependent on the proportion of the total AIME earned by each spouse within the couple.
> For example, a one-earner couple each age 62 in 1980 with AIME of $1,000 would have a benefit of $648 (a worker's benefit of $432 plus a spouse benefit of $216). If each spouse had one-half of the earnings, the benefit would be $544. (Each would receive a worker's benefit of $272.)

The HHS report also observed that, as in the case of couples, the survivor of a two-earner couple generally gets a lower benefit than the survivor of a one-earner couple with the same total AIME. For example, the report noted, at AIME of $1,000, the aged survivor's benefit is $432 if only one spouse was a paid worker and only $272—$160 less—if each spouse had AIME of $500—the same total earnings of $1,000.

As I noted earlier, this results from the interplay of the dependent spouse benefit and the weighted benefit formula.

DISABILITY PROTECTION

Finally, a woman who spends years working in the home has no disability protection under Social Security for herself or her dependents even though her disability could cause grave economic hardships for her family. Even if she has recently returned to the work force and is currently earning Social Security credits, she may not yet have met the insured status requirements for disability benefits if she becomes disabled soon after she reenters the work force.

MARRIAGE ALSO AN ECONOMIC PARTNERSHIP

Mr. President, it is time that we begin the task of revising the Social Security System to recognize and reflect the changing roles and responsibilities of both men and women in our society and provide for a more equitable recognition of their contributions to a family unit.

Marriage, insofar as economics are concerned, should be viewed as an interdependent partnership in which each spouse makes a contribution—either in the paid work force or as a homemaker or in some combination of roles—and both ought to accrue Social Security protection equally.

The view of female dependency which is a foundation of the present Social Security System belongs to a bygone era. Women today are achieving the status of equal partnership with men in every facet of our society. The Social Security System needs to be updated to reflect that partnership.

EARNINGS SHARING—A CONCEPT FOR TODAY'S MARRIAGE PARTNERSHIP

Mr. President, as I indicated at the outset, S. 3 would incorporate the concept of earnings sharing into the Social Security System. Marriage for Social Security purposes would be regarded as an economic partnership. In order to compute benefits, all of the earnings of a married couple would be combined and divided equally between the spouses upon retirement or divorce. Each partner would have established for him or her an individual Social Security account. Earnings acquired before or after a marriage would go into this individual account along with whatever share each partner acquired during marriage. The concept of dependency would be replaced by the concept of equality.

Although this is a major change from the current Social Security System of benefit accrual, it is a principle which is now applied in virtually every jurisdiction with respect to other assets acquired during a marriage. Upon the termination of a marriage, these other assets are generally divided equally between the husband and wife. It is similar to the concept of community property which has long existed in States like California. Interests in other pension programs are now generally considered part of the assets acquired during the marriage and are considered in the division of property between the couple upon the termination of the marriage.

The same would be true if we incorporate the earnings-sharing concept into the Social Security System. I think it is interesting to note, in this regard, that recently enacted Federal legislation has allowed these principles to be applied to military and civil service pensions.

There have, of course, been numerous proposals made to deal with the inequities and inadequacies of the current system. The earnings-sharing concept, however, has numerous advantages. It would eliminate the current discrimination against two-wage earner families. It would no longer be possible for them to receive less benefits than one-earner families with identical earnings records. It would recognize the value of the contribution of a homemaker and accord her a Social Security account in her own right. If divorce or death of a spouse should occur—and for a woman age 65 or older, the chances are very high that she will confront one of these situations—a woman could build upon the separate account created for her during her years of marriage, rather than be forced to start from scratch in establishing a Social Security account. Likewise, credits from earnings she receives prior to marriage will be able to be added to her account accrued during marriage. The same, of course, would be true for the husband. Women who enter and leave the workforce to fill the necessary child-rearing roles would no longer be unfairly penalized by gaps in their Social Security coverage.

Mr. President, earnings sharing has repeatedly been identified as the most direct and equitable approach to dealing with the variety of different problems facing women under the current system. Although various interim and single-purpose measures have been proposed, the attractiveness of the earnings-sharing approach is that it would help to resolve many of these problems.

VARIATIONS WITHIN THE EARNINGS-SHARING CONCEPT

Obviously, however, a proposal such as earnings sharing which calls for a major restructuring of the Social Security benefit system involves many complex and important questions. No one has seriously proposed a pure earnings-sharing model. Such a model would be far too harsh on many individuals. Thus, every earnings-sharing model which has been put forward has represented a modified earnings-sharing concept. For example, the legislation that Representative OAKAR and I have introduced provides for 100-percent inheritance of a couple's combined benefits—up to the ceiling for the applicable years—for the surviving spouse. Other proposals advanced—for example, the model contained in the 1979 report "Social Security and the Changing Roles of Men and Women"—have proposed variations such as an 80-percent inheritance provision. Virtually all models include provisions to address the need to provide adequate protection for dependent children of deceased workers and special provisions to deal with disabled workers.

COST IMPLICATIONS

There is widespread agreement that the earnings-sharing concept itself would not entail any additional costs for the Social Security System. Indeed, a pure earnings-sharing model would probably result in substantial cost-savings. Most of the modified earnings-sharing proposals which have been developed would be cost-neutral. They would simply reallocate benefits on a more equitable basis. However, it is also generally recognized that a transition from the current system to a new system would entail certain transitional costs designed to protect various categories of beneficiaries from being unduly hurt during the transition period. What those costs would be depend in part upon how these transitional provisions are designed and the length of time for such a transition.

TRANSITION PERIOD

There are major decisions which must be made with respect to a transition period. Changes of this dimension and scope must be phased-in over time so that individuals can make appropriate plans for their retirement years. The 1979 HHS report represented two models for a transition period. Representative OAKAR's bill included the first model, which provides for a grandfathering of current benefits or benefits established under the earnings-sharing concept, whichever is greater until the year 2011. The other model proposed in the HHS report, providing for a lengthy delay in the effective date, is the one included in S. 3.

The Social Security changes proposed in S. 3 would not take effect with respect to any one over the age of 50 in 1985. Those under 50 would begin having Social Security accounts established and computed under this proposal henceforth. Because no one under age 50 could reach the minimum retirement age of 62 before 1997, no one under age 50 in 1985 would actually begin receiving benefits under this system until 1997 at the earliest. Different transition provisions are provided for individuals who might become eligible for Social Security disability benefits during this phase-in. In no case, however, would a person who became disabled during this period ever receive less benefits as long as that disability continued than they would be entitled to under the old system.

Mr. President, each of the transition proposals presented in the HHS 1979 report are thus represented in the earnings-sharing measures which have been introduced in the Congress—H.R. 158 and S. 3. I suspect, however, that a preferable approach lies somewhere in between the first option, the grandfathering of current benefits for a long period of time, and the second option, delaying the effective date of the new system. The complete grandfathering approach, although attractive from a beneficiaries perspective, would entail significant additional costs.

Conversely, although the second option of delaying the effective date would not have any additional cost implications, it would mean that none of the benefits of the new system would be realized by those women over age 50 who are rapidly approaching retirement. The need to develop a satisfactory transition mechanism was a major motivating factor behind my offering an amendment to the 1983 Social Security legislation directing HHS to prepare and submit to Congress a report on implementation of various models of earnings sharing in Social Security, including appropriate transition mechanisms.

It is important to note that such a transition would most likely take place after fiscal year 1992 when the Social Security trust fund moves out of the unified budget pursuant to the 1983 amendments. Thus, any costs associated with such a transition would not affect the Federal deficit. Additionally, this transition would take place during the period when the trust fund itself is projected to be building up major surpluses. Whatever costs would be incurred within the transition period would have to be consistent with the overall fiscal condition and future obligations of the trust fund, but those transition costs would have no impact upon the Federal deficit once Social Security is removed from the unified budget at the end of fiscal year 1992.

1983 REPORT AMENDMENT

Mr. President, because of the need for substantial in-depth analysis of the modifications that would be needed in any earnings-sharing proposal and the necessity of providing for an adequate transition process, when the 1983 Social Security legislation was before the Senate, I offered an amendment, which was enacted as section 344 of Public Law 98-21, to require the Department of Health and Human Services to submit to the Congress a report on implementation of earnings sharing. At the time that I offered this amendment, I explicitly stated that the mandate report should not be viewed as a study of the problems facing women under Social Security, but rather it should be focused upon how an earnings sharing concept could be implemented. At the time I offered the amendment—March 16, 1983, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, daily ed. S3045, I stated:

> I want to stress that this amendment does not call for another study. We did that in 1977. The 1977 social security amendments called for HHS to study the problems facing women under the social security system. The report developed as a result of the 1977 amendments presented the earnings-sharing model as one of two possible comprehensive approaches for dealing with these problems. . . . What needs to be done now is to work out and test the details on how a specific earnings-sharing model can be implemented, and determine what type of transition provisions are needed and what modifications in the basic earnings-sharing concept are necessary in order to provide adequate protection for various categories of beneficiaries.

I should note also that the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], who was then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and the floor manager of the Social Security bill, also made it clear in his statement accepting my amendment that he, too, recognized that the amendment was not—I stress not—calling for another study of the problems facing women in Social Security, but was focused upon advancing the concept of earnings sharing beyond the study stage. The amendment as enacted called for the Department to submit its report to Congress by July 1, 1984.

REPORT LONG OVERDUE

However, Mr. President, as of this date, the statutorily mandated report has not been submitted. Indeed, not only did the Department fail to meet the deadline for submission, no request for an extension of time or formal notification to the Congress that the report was delayed or would be forthcoming at any particular time has been submitted. I would note, however, that the acting Social Security Commissioner, Martha McSteen, was exceedingly courteous and responsive to my requests for information on the Department's progress on the report, including coming to my office last spring to brief me and other interested parties on the Department's plans. Her staff was equally cooperative.

Nevertheless, one of the reasons for the failure to submit the report on time is, in my view, absolutely unacceptable. Early last year, I was advised that the Department intended to enter into a contract with a private organization for the purpose of soliciting the views of various interested groups regarding the treatment of women under the Social Security system. At that time, I along with Representative OAKAR and many organizations interested in the earnings-sharing report, expressed strong opposition to such an undertaking as certainly not being what was sought by Congress in enacting section 344. Despite this opposition, the Department on May 9 awarded a 6-month contract to carry out this survey which obviously made it impossible for the administration to meet the July 1 statutory deadline.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a March 16, 1984, letter, which I sent to Secretary Heckler and a joint letter of July 31, 1984, which Representative OAKAR and I sent to the Secretary be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks following the text of the bill.

Although the report from the contractor has not been released yet, it is fairly easy to conclude from information from the various organizations which were surveyed that nothing particularly new was discovered as a result of this survey and expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars. The problems of special concern to women in the Social Security System have been identified over and over by the various commissions and task forces which have looked at the problem; they have been discussed in congressional hearings for a number of years; and they have been the subject of numerous articles and reports. The time for study is over; the time for action is here.

CONTENT OF DRAFT REPORT

Mr. President, although I have not yet received a copy of the report, what I have learned about it already causes me grave concern. At the same time that HHS was given the responsibility for preparing an implementation report on earnings sharing, a number of indivduals and organizations interested in earnings sharing began meeting to work on the development of an earnings-sharing proposal. Supported by a variety of private funds, this group, called the "Technical Committee for Social Security Reform for Women," has been working over the past several years on this project. The Urban Institute has been providing data analysis to the Technical Committee, using its computer model of the Social Security population. The preliminary model developed by the Technical Committee was finished last year. The committee has planned to hold a series of meetings and conferences to discuss the model before completing its work.

In the meantime, last year the Department of HHS requested permission to use in its report the preliminary model of an earnings-sharing proposal developed by the Technical Committee. The committee agreed on the condition that they would be provided with an opportunity to review and comment in advance how the Department was using and describing the data which the Technical Committee has developed in connection with its proposal. At the end of last year, the chapter of the Department's report dealing with the Technical Committee's work was shared with representatives of that group. Unfortunately, it appears that there are sharp disagreements over the presentation of the data in that chapter and the omission of Technical Committee's transition proposal as well as strong indications that the rest of the report may be seriously flawed. It is a great disappointment to me that this opportunity for the Department of HHS to assist in development of a long-range, but sorely needed reform has been a source of continuing controversy, in so many respects—in terms of the insistence of the Department to employ a private contractor for a totally unnecessary task, the delay in submitting the report, and now what appears to be a substantial problem over whether the report will represent an objective and unbiased analysis of the issue.

In any event, I am pleased that the Technical Committee's work has gone forward and that its model will soon be available for public discussion. Members of my staff have attended meetings of the Technical Committee, as have staff representing Representative OAKAR, and I feel very enthusiastic about the depth of the work that this group has done and its findings regarding the impact of the earnings-sharing model, particularly in terms of the issues of adequacy and equity and an appropriate transition. As soon as the Technical Committee's preliminary report is finalized, I intend to share some of its findings and analyses with my colleagues.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, earnings sharing represents a major reform which obviously cannot be implemented overnight. But such an effort must begin now so that future generations of women will be adequately and equitably treated under the Social Security System. The Social Security System is vital to the security and well-being of millions of Americans—current retirees and disabled persons and future ones. We have an obligation to protect the system. But equally important is the obligation to make sure that the system remains responsive to the changing needs and roles within our population. Over the years, the Social Security System has grown and responded to changing needs in many ways, such as adding disability coverage and the Medicare Program. Earnings sharing is a concept that is part of that process of growth and responsiveness.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of S. 3 be printed at this point in the RECORD followed by the letters previously described.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Social Security Equity Act of 1985".

Sec. 2. Title II of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"SHARING OF EARNINGS BY MARRIED COUPLES

"Sec. 234.(a)(1) For purposes of determining the eligibility of an individual and the spouse of such individual for old-age and disability benefits and the amount of such benefits to which each is or may become separately entitled, the combined earnings of such individual and such spouse shall, to the extent that such earnings are attributable to the marriage period of such individual and such spouse (as determined under paragraph (2)), be divided, equally between then and shared in accordance with this section.

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), for purposes of this section, the term 'marriage period' means the period—

"(i) beginning with the first day of the calendar year in which the marriage of an individual and the spouse of such individual occurs, and

"(ii) ending with the last day of the calendar year preceding the earliest calendar year in which such individual or such spouse dies, they are divorced, or one of them files application for old-age or disability insurance benefits.

"(B)(i) No marriage period shall begin for any individual and the spouse of such individual if their marriage occurs after such individual or such spouse has filed an application for old-age insurance benefits.

"(ii) No marriage period shall include a period for which such individual or such spouse is entitled to disability insurance benefits or the waiting period (as defined in section 223(c)(2)) with respect to such benefits.

"(iii) A marriage period shall include the 'earliest calendar year' referred to in clause (ii) of subparagraph (A) for purposes of recomputations for that year under section 215(f)(2), in any case where an individual or the spouse of such individual dies or they are divorced, unless the survivor (where one of them dies) or either of them (where they are divorced) is remarried later in the same year.

"(b)(1) Except to the extent otherwise provided in subsections (c), (d), and (e), an individual and the spouse of such individual shall each be credited for all the purposes of this title with wages and self-employment income, for each calendar year for which either of them is credited with any wages and self-employment income without regard to this section during their marriage period, in an amount equal to—

"(A) 50 percent of the combined total of the wages and self-employment income otherwise credited to both of them for that year if (at the close of the month for which the benefit determinations involved are being made) they are both still living, or

"(B) 100 percent of such combined total, up to but not exceeding the maximum amount that may be counted for that year without exceeding the ceiling imposed for that year under section 215(e), if (at the close of such month) one of them has died.

"(2) Nothing in this section shall affect the crediting of wages and self-employment income to any individual for any calendar year not included in a marriage period of such individual; but to the extent that wages and self-employment income are credited pursuant to this section the other provisions of this title specifying the manner in which wages and self-employment income are to be credited shall (to the extent inconsistent with this section) not apply.

"(3) Except where the context requires otherwise, for purposes of this section, the term 'spouse' includes a divorced spouse, a surviving spouse, and a surviving divorced spouse.

"(c) Subsections (a) and (b) shall not apply with respect to the crediting of wages and self-employment income for any calendar year, in the case of any individual and the spouse of such individual, if—

"(1) as a result of the application of such subsections with respect to that year such individual or such spouse would cease to be a fully insured individual (as defined in section 214(a)); or

"(2) such individual or such spouse is applying for disability insurance benefits (or for the establishment of a period of disability) and as a result of the application of such subsections with respect to that year would cease to be insured for such benefits under section 223(c)(1) (or for such a period under section 216(i)(3)).

"(d) Subsections (a) and (b) shall not apply for purposes of determining the amount of the benefit payable to any individual for any month if—

"(1) the total amount of the wages and self-employment income credited to such individual for a marriage period, as determined without regard to this section, is higher than the total amount of the wages and self-employment income credited to such individual's spouse for that period, as so determined; and

"(2) such individual's spouse (taking subsections (a) and (b) into account) has not filed application for old-age or disability insurance benefits by the close of such month.

"(e) Notwithstanding any of the preceding provisions of this section—

"(1) benefits payable under subsection (d) or (h) of section 202 on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of any individual, and benefits payable under subsection (b), (c), (e), (f), or (g) of such section 202 (on the basis of such wages and self-employment income) to any person other than a spouse who has shared in or been credited with a part of such individual's earnings under subsections (a) and (b) of this section, shall be determined as though this section had not been enacted if—

"(A) the application of this section has changed such individual's primary insurance amount from what it would otherwise have been; and

"(B) the crediting of wages and self-employment income to such individual and the spouse of such individual without regard to this section would increase the amount of such benefits; and

"(2) in the application of section 203(a) (relating to maximum family benefits) with respect to benefits payable on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of any individual, where all or any part of the wages and self-employment income of such individual and the spouse of such individual was credited to them in accordance with this section, the primary insurance amount of such individual (and the crediting of such wages and self-employment income) shall be determined in accordance with this section but the benefits payable to any other person on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such individual shall be determined without regard to this section.

"(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no wife's, husband's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefit shall be paid to any individual for any month under subsection (b), (c), (e), or (f) of section 202, and no individual shall be entitled to any such benefit, unless—

"(1) the period of such individual's marriage (to the spouse or former spouse on the basis of whose wages and self-employment income such benefit is payable) ended before the effective date of this section;

"(2) such individual is under the age of 62 (and is otherwise entitled to such benefit);

"(3) such benefit is payable without regard to age and solely by reason of such individual's having a child in his or her care; or

"(4) the application of this section to such individual is prevented by subsection (c) or (d) (or by clause (i) or (ii) of subsection (a)(2)(B)).

"(g) For purposes of subsections (a)(2) and (d), an individual's application for old-age or disability insurance benefits shall be deemed to have been filed on the first day of the first month for which (by reason of the operation of section 202(j) or 223(b)) such individual is entitled to such benefits.".

the provisions of this Act shall not apply for the period during which the conditions of subparagraph (B) continue to be met and during which such individual (i) continues to be eligible for such benefit, or (ii) in the case of such an individual who continued to be eligible for such benefit until age 62, is entitled to an old-age insurance benefit.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, DC, March 16, 1984.

Hon. MARGARET M. HECKLER,
Secretary of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC.

DEAR MARGARET: Thank you for your February 28 letter regarding the Department's progress on the earnings sharing report mandated by Public Law 98-21. I appreciate the continuing cooperation of you and the Department staff in keeping my office apprised on the project.

I am writing today to share with you my very strong concerns about the proposed contract which the Department intends to enter into with a private contractor for the purpose of soliciting the views of various interested groups. First, the utilization of such a device creates the unfortunate impression that the Department is attempting to insulate itself from any direct contact with the interested groups. In my earlier correspondence, I had suggested that the Department establish some sort of communication process to keep these organizations apprised of the Department's activities. I had envisioned some sort of formal or informal briefing process to give the groups firsthand information on the Department's progress on the report.

Second, the purpose of this contract—as described in the Statement of Work enclosed with the February 16, 1984, bid solicitation letter—appears to bear little, if any, relationship to the report mandated by Public Law 98-21. The primary task of the contract is to "gather information on the views of the various interested organizations regarding the treatment of women under social security. . . ." Footnote 1 on page 2 of the Statement of Work underscores this purpose.

This kind of undertaking is certainly not one contemplated by section 343 of Public Law 98-21. Indeed, the legislative history of this section makes it quite clear that Congress did not want the Department to undertake a "study" of the problems facing women under the social security system. At the time I offered the amendment in the Senate, I stated, "I want to stress that this amendment does not call for another study. We did that in 1977. The 1977 social security amendments in section 341 called for HHS to study the problems facing women under the social security system." (Congressional Record, March 16, 1983, S3045). The distinguished Chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Dole, made it clear in his floor statement accepting my amendment that he, too, recognized that the amendment was not calling for another study of the problems facing women in social security, but was focused upon advancing the concept of earnings sharing beyond the study stage. (Id. at S3046.) The relevant excerpts from the Congressional Record are enclosed.

There is little justification for the Department to expend in the neighborhood of a quarter of a million dollars to gather the information described in the Statement of Work, particularly in light of the legislative history of section 343 of Public Law 98-21 and the fact that the general issues relating to women and social security have been amply studied for the past decade. Moreover, many groups recently submitted testimony outlining their views and concerns in hearings before the Task Force on Social Security and Women of the House Select Committee on Aging (September 22, 1983). If this hearing record is somehow inadequate for the Department's information needs, the Department could, through a Federal Register notice, solicit various groups to submit their concerns in writing on the points delineated in the Statement of Work.

Third, I fail to understand how the results of a contract with a six-month period of performance could contribute to the report you are required by law to submit by this July 1. Certainly, the noncompletion of an irrelevant contract would form no basis for noncompliance with the statutory due date for the report.

Not only is this contract totally unnecessary, but it is apparently being offered by the Department in lieu of any meaningful communications process with the interested groups about the mandated report.

Under these circumstances, I strongly urge that the proposed contract be cancelled and that briefings with the concerned groups be instituted immediately. In order to move this process forward and use the time of your staff most effectively, and because the last briefing of my staff was over a month and a half ago, I ask that a briefing be scheduled for my staff and other interested Congressional staff along with interested groups at the earliest possible time. Please ask a member of your staff to contact Susanne Martinez (224-3553), my Legislative Assistant, to work out the details regarding time, location, and participants.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, July 31, 1984.

Hon. MARGARET HECKLER,
Secretary of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC.

DEAR MADAME SECRETARY: As you know, section 343 of Public Law 98-21 requires you, by July 1, 1984, to develop proposals for earnings-sharing legislation for social security and to submit a report to the appropriate Committees of the Congress on them. Section 343 also specifies that this report contain certain other information relating to implementation of earnings-sharing legislation. Obviously, the mandated report was not submitted by the statutory deadline.

We are very disappointed that the Department did not meet the deadline required by law or formally request the Congress to extend the reporting date. If such a request had been properly submitted, it undoubtedly would have been granted. However, simply to ignore the statutory deadline suggests a cavalier attitude towards Congressional mandates that neither fosters respect for the law nor enhances Congressional relationships.

Moreover, in the instant case, failure to request a legislative extension leaves the Congress and those interested in the content of the mandated report with no indication of when—if ever—the Department intends to comply with the requirements of section 343 of Public Law 98-21. These concerns are compounded by the Department's decision to proceed with its contract with an outside organization to "gather information on the views of various interested organizations regarding the treatment of women under the social security system."

We have previously expressed our strong opposition to this contract, both because of the unnecessary cost as well as the limited relationship of the scope of work outlined under the contract to the mandated earnings-sharing report. Similar concerns have been expressed by virtually every outside organization interested in the earnings-sharing report.

Given the circumstances, and your failure to comply with the clear statutory requirements, we strongly urge that the report be completed and sent to Congress no later than September 25, 1984.

Finally, Acting Commissioner Martha McSteen previously made a commitment to hold a briefing in July for interested organizations and Congressional representatives on the progress that has been made by the Department on the report. We strongly urge that this briefing take place immediately and that the Department be prepared to provide orally a progress report on the study, how it has been conducted, an explanation of the contractor's activities and how the results will fit into the final report, and any other appropriate information. We also suggest that a representative from the private contractor be available at the briefing to respond to questions that may arise relating to the contractor's work.

The results of the earnings-sharing study are of great importance in Congress' consideration of this issue and to the millions of women who receive social security benefits. We look forward to hearing from you and appreciate your immediate attention to this matter.

With best wishes,
Cordially,

Alan Cranston.

S. 4: CHILD-CARE ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 3, the first day of the 99th Congress, S. 4, the proposed Child-Care Assistance Act of 1985, was introduced. This measure is based upon the legislation I first introduced in 1979, and which I introduced in the last Congress. This legislation has been numbered S. 4 on each previous occasion on which it has been introduced. This proposal arose out of the recommendations and testimony presented during an extensive series of hearings which I chaired in 1977, 1978, and 1979 while I had the privilege of serving as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Child and Human Development of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. It has been shaped by consultations over the past several years with numerous organizations and individuals concerned about the need to provide adequate affordable child-care services to the millions of American families who need and desire such services in order for one or both parents to remain or enter the labor force. The changes in the bill in the 98th and 99th Congress represent continuous refinements of the initial proposal. The basic framework and purpose remains the same—to increase assistance to working families in need of child-care services.

I am pleased to be joined in introducing this measure by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE], who served with me on the Child and Human Development Subcommittee when this legislation was being developed and was an original cosponsor of S. 4 when it was first introduced in 1979, as well as the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] who is the current ranking minority member of the Family and Human Services Subcommittee of the Labor and Human Resources Committee as well as the cochairman of the Senate children's caucus, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the ranking minority member of the full Labor and Human Resources Committee, who has also been a strong supporter and cosponsor of this legislation in the past.

Mr. President, as I will discuss in a few moments, there are certain other child-care initiatives which several of us are currently exploring. Reintroduction of S. 4 on the first day of the 99th Congress was intended to make clear a continuing commitment to a comprehensive approach to dealing with a wide array of needs in the area of child care. Nevertheless, a realistic assessment of the potential for achieving enactment of legislation of the scope of S. 4 during this Congress has stimulated the supporters of S. 4 and others to seek to develop a series of separate, more limited child-care measures which could be acted upon at different points and by different committees. I intend to work closely with other interested Senators in developing these separate bills.

Mr. President, I am pleased to report that a companion bill to S. 4 will be introduced in the House of Representatives by my good friend and colleague from California, Representative EDWARD ROYBAL, who also introduced the companions to S. 4 in the House in the 96th, 97th, and 98th Congresses, H.R. 1211, H.R. 573, and H.R. 1741, respectively. ED ROYBAL has a longstanding and deep commitment to the issue of child care, and I am delighted to continue working with him to develop sound and realistic proposals to meet the growing need of American families for high quality, yet affordable, child care.

BACKGROUND

Mr. President, throughout my service in the Senate, I have been deeply involved with issues relating to child-care services for working parents. The lack of adequate child care is one of the most serious problems facing millions of families, and it serves as a major impediment to the attainment of economic security for countless numbers of women and children.

While I served as the chairman of the Child and Human Development Subcommittee, I had the opportunity to chair a series of hearings, both in Washington and in my own State of California, which focused upon the enormous and growing need for decent, affordable child-care services for the millions of young children whose parents are in the work force.

Mr. President, it is not an exaggeration to say that what was once a major problem is rapidly approaching a major crisis. During the past 4 years under the Reagan administration, the Nation's inadequate supply of child care has deteriorated even further. At the same time as the Federal Government has reduced funding for existing child-care programs, the number of mothers of young children entering the labor force has continued to grow.

When I first began work on S. 4 in 1977, it was estimated that 50.7 percent of the mothers of children under age 18 and 40.9 percent of the mothers of children under age 6 were in the work force. By 1984, those numbers had increased to 65 and 52 percent, respectively. These figures translate to more than 9 million children under 6 and almost 15 million children between 6 and 13 whose mothers are employed. This week new figures were reported by the Department of Labor showing that last year almost half—46.8 percent—of the mothers of children under age 1 and nearly two-thirds—65 percent—of those with children under the age of 3 were in the work force.

Moreover, demographic data indicate that these increases will continue. It has been projected that by the year 1990 there will be 11.5 million children under the age of 6 and 17.2 million children between the ages of 6 and 13 whose mothers will be working. That represents an increase of almost 5 million children from the current 24 million children under age 13 with mothers in the work force.

The data also indicate a wide disparity between the number of children with employed mothers and the number of available child-care slots. The Department of Health and Human Services, in reports issued in 1980 and 1981, indicated that there were some 900,000 center-based and 5.2 million family day-care places available. That's less than 1 place in 3 for the then 22 million under-age-13 children who had employed mothers.

WHERE ARE THE CHILDREN AND WHAT IS HAPPENING TO THEM?

What is happening to the two-thirds of the children for whom there were no slots?

We don't really know. We do know from Census reports that almost 20 percent of the children between the ages of 6 and 13 whose mothers are working full time take care of themselves after school until a parent returns home. That means that millions of children, many as young as 6 years of age, are left for periods up to four hours a day in empty homes or in school yards or on the streets.

The Census figures are also probably on the low side since in many States leaving a child of tender years alone without adult supervision can be considered child neglect and many parents are reluctant to admit they leave their children alone. The Children's Defense Fund has estimated that as many as 6 to 7 million children under the age of 13 are probably left to fend for themselves for a large part of their day.

During the hearings on S. 4 held in the 95th and 96th Congresses, we heard parents from all over the country testify about the inadequacy of existing resources, the lengthy waiting lists, and the dismal alternatives faced by families. We heard of children being sent to live with relatives in other States because their parents could not find adequate, affordable child care. The large gap between the number of available child-care places and the number of children needing care translated into the very real and moving stories told by witness after witness. Similar hearings were held last year by the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families. the findings from those hearings are remarkably similar to those we arrived at during our Senate hearings.

The House committee, in its report issued in September of 1984, said of the problem—page ix:

> Waiting lists for family day care homes and centers for infants and after-school programs for school-aged children are commonplace. Child care for children who are ill or disabled is extremely limited, as is care for abused and neglected children, and for children of teen parents. Even preschool care, the most widely available of all child care, is inadequate in many communities.

Indeed, the problem has grown, not diminished.

Mr. President, in every community across the land, the number of children left alone appears to be significant. A September 1981 U.S. News & World Report story told of Houston officials' estimates that between 40 and 60 percent of that city's schoolchildren are on their own until parents return from work; estimates by an elementary schoolteacher in Indianapolis that 80 percent of her school's children go home to empty houses; and reports by a sixth grade teacher in Maryland that 24 of her 28 students were latch-key children.

In two major cities—Detroit and Newark—fire department officials are reported to have said that one in six calls received involve children alone in a house. The chilling consequence of such statistics—the loss of young lives—has become all too frequent.

Mr. President, add to the number of latch-key children the number of children who are left in unsafe or inadequate care, the number of parents who are forced to drop out of the work force and go on welfare because they cannot find child care, and the number of children who are shuffled from program to program, and the picture becomes more and more grim.

CHILD CARE DRASTICALLY CUT

As desperate as the situation was in 1979, when S. 4 was first introduced, it has quite obviously grown worse in the intervening years. While the number of children needing care has continued to escalate, resources for child care have been slashed. The Social Security Act title XX program, the major source of direct financial assistance to child-care programs was reduced in fiscal year 1982 from $3.1 to $2.4 billion and the $200 million earmark for child care was eliminated. The estimates were at that time that some 150,000 families would lose their child-care assistance under title XX as a result of the first-year Reagan cuts. Those projections have been substantiated by reports on how child-care programs in various States have actually been hurt by the funding cutbacks.

The National Women's Law Center, in a report issued in April 1982, documented some of the impact. It found, for example, that in Alabama the number of title XX subsidized day-care slots were reduced from 11,000 to 8,500. In Michigan, an almost 25-percent reduction in the number of children being served in child-care programs was reported. In Massachusetts, eligibility for title XX was lowered to include only persons with income no greater than 70 percent of the State's median income. Arkansas and Illinois were reported to have imposed new, higher fee requirements, pushing many low-income families out of the progam.

Mr. President, more recently, the Children's Defense Fund [CDF] completed a national survey on the impact of the Federal title XX cuts on State child-care programs between 1981 and 1983. That report, entitled "Children and Federal Child Care Cuts," presents a devastating picture of what has happened to what was at best a dismally inadequate support system. CDF surveyed every State to gather information from State officials responsible for the child-care program funded under title XX. The report found that—

Thirty-two States were providing title XX child care to fewer children in 1983 than in 1981;

The total combined Federal and State spending for title XX child care dropped by 14 percent between 1981 and 1983;

Ten States made fewer low-income working families eligible for title XX child care;

Twenty States made it more difficult for low-income mothers in training programs to become eligible for title XX child care;

Nineteen States increased fees for services or imposed minimum fees that made it harder for low-income working families to afford title XX child care, forcing many families to move their children to less desirable child-care arrangements;

Forty-two States made changes that threaten to lower the quality of title XX child care services;

Twenty-four States reduced funds for training child-care workers;

Thirty-three States lowered their child-care standards; and Thirty-two States cut back on the number of child-care staff.

The CDF report concluded that there is no reason to believe that the many children who lost title XX child care were picked up by other programs. Indeed, one 1983 survey in New York State indicated that many children who lost title XX subsidies are staying home alone. The study estimated that at least one-sixth of the children affected by the funding cuts are regularly left unsupervised.

Mr. President, between May and July of 1984, CDF did a followup survey of State officials responsible for the child-care programs funded under title XX. That report entitled "Child Care: The States' Response. A Survey of State Child Care Policies, 1983-1984," found, at best, minor improvements in limited areas of child care since the first report, and concluded that the majority of States, although not having made further reductions, had not yet begun to restore the damage done in 1981. They found that 25 States were still spending less for child care in 1984 than they did in 1981, despite the increased need and inflation, and that 27 were serving fewer children under the title XX program in 1984 than they did in 1981.

Mr. President, the information is not yet all in, but what we do know paints a dismal picture for child care across the Nation. The reduction of Federal support has forced many States to slash support for child-care programs; in many cases, this has caused programs to raise their fees, further driving up—beyond the reach of many low-income families—the cost of child care.

FEMINIZATION OF POVERTY

Mr. President, as serious as the problems are in the supply of safe, affordable child care today, there is simply no question that the need will grow in the decade ahead.

It is equally important to understand that these mothers are in the work force for one major reason: economic necessity. Two-thirds of the women in the work force are either sole providers or have husbands who earn less than $15,000. In 1983, 25 percent of the married women in the work force had husbands earning less than $10,000; 50 percent under $20,000, and nearly 80 percent less than $30,000. The earnings of these women play a critical role in the economic well-being of their families. For the 1 in 6 American families headed by a woman, her earnings are a matter of simple survival.

Mr. President, although adequate child care is a matter which ought to concern every member of our society—male and female alike—there is little question that the lack of adequate child care has a major and profound impact upon the economic well-being of millions of women and children in this country. Increasingly, our Nation has been experiencing what has been graphically described as "the feminization of poverty." Although the number of families living in poverty has remained relatively constant over the past decade, the composition of those families has dramatically changed. The number of poor families headed by a male dropped from 3.2 million to 2.6 million between 1969 and 1978, while the number headed by women increased by one-third, from 1.8 million to 2.7 million. Today, families with female heads have a poverty rate six times that of male-headed families, and almost one-third of all female-headed families live below the poverty line.

Lack of affordable child care is a major factor in keeping these women and their children in poverty. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has published two important reports focusing on the factors that limit economic opportunities for women. The first report, "Women: Still in Poverty," published in July 1979, identified the lack of adequate child care as one of the key obstacles to women in poverty. The Commission noted:

> In the absence of safe affordable child care, women who would raise their families out of poverty must remain outside the labor force, or when compelled to work, place their children in circumstances detrimental to their wholesome growth.

The second report, "Child Care and Equal Opportunity for Women," published in July 1981, examined in even greater detail the extent to which lack of adequate child-care services restricts women, particularly in terms of employment opportunities.

Here is what this report found:

First, substantial numbers of women are prevented from taking paid work because of the unavailability or inadequacy of child care. The Commission noted that a number of studies suggest that approximately one of every five or six unemployed women is unemployed because she is unable to make satisfactory child-care arrangements.

Second, the unavailability of adequate child care limits employment opportunities for many women—either in terms of their hours of employment or their inability to seek or accept job promotions or acquire the training necessary for advancement.

Finally, lack of child care or inadequate child care can have a detrimental effect upon job performance. A UAW representative told the Civil Rights Commission that stress was a significant factor in industrial accidents and that worry about inadequate child care was cited as the single greatest cause of stress by a number of female assembly line workers participating at a 1978 conference on occupational health and working women. One of the key reasons a number of employers have recently become interested in helping their employees find or secure adequate child-care services is because of the recognition that lack of such care has a detrimental effect upon employee performance.

Mr. President, it is clear that the unavailability of adequate child care restricts very substantially the employment opportunities of working mothers and does so in a variety of ways. Adequate child care must be a cornerstone of any effort to provide equal opportunities in the work force to American women. Without such assistance, attainment of economic security will remain an elusive goal for millions and millions of women and their children.

THE WIDENING GAP IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. President, it is important, I believe, to focus for a moment on what appears to be a widening gap in Federal assistance for child-care services between families at different ends of the income spectrum.

On the one hand, as I have described, the little support which was once available to low-income families through title XX has been drastically reduced. At the same time, Federal assistance for child-care expenses incurred by moderate and upper income families has been steadily increasing. Today, the largest source of Federal support for child-care costs—now estimated to be almost $2 billion—is provided under the IRS child-care tax credit.

I cosponsored and supported the 1981 expansion of the child-care tax credit because I shared the view that increases in the credit were long overdue. Those changes, enacted as part of the 1981 tax bill, Public Law 97-34, increased the maximum amount of credit which could be claimed and included provisions giving more benefits to families on the lower end of the income scale. However, the measure which was approved by the Senate and which I strongly supported included provisions which would have made the credit refundable, thus allowing benefits to go to those low-income working families whose taxable income is too low to be affected by a nonrefundable tax credit. Unfortunately, however, the House conferees refused to accept the Senate refundability provisions and, as a consequence, these families continue to be excluded from the benefits of the largest source of Federal support for child-care expenses.

Mr. President, in 1979, almost 80 percent of the benefits under the child-care tax credit went to families with annual incomes over $15,000. Although the 1981 amendments should result in a greater proportion of the credit going to lower income families, the fact remains that utilization of the tax code as a primary vehicle for providing Federal financial assistance in meeting child-care expenses of working parents has major limitations in terms of helping those in greatest need of assistance. Even with the Senate refundability provision, the tax credit would not have adequately resolved many of the problems faced by these families. Tax adjustments the following April do little to help families with limited cash resources to meet the weekly and monthly child-care fees that absorb major portions of their incomes.

And, finally, a tax credit does little to increase the supply of adequate child care—a continuing problem.

Thus, although bringing about a reasonable and fair child-care tax credit is an important part of an overall program to help working families meet their child-care needs, it cannot be the sole source of support. We need to find ways to help those families who are falling through the cracks, and that is what S. 4 is designed to do.

PURPOSES OF S. 4

Mr. President, the purpose of the proposed Child-Care Assistance Act of 1985 is to promote the availability and diversity of quality child-care services for all children and families who need such services by providing assistance to the States to expand the existing supply of child-care services, improve the quality of and coordination among child-care programs, and generally foster increased coordination of programs at the local, State, and Federal levels. Grants would be available to States, under the terms specified in the bill, to carry out these activities and to make additional resources available to help families find and meet the costs of child care. The bill would also create mechanisms to facilitate an assessment of the extent of the need for child-care services throughout the Nation, both an initial assessment within the next few years and continuing assessments periodically thereafter.

Additionally, and fundamentally, the bill is aimed at strengthening the functioning of families by seeking to assure that parents are not forced by lack of available programs or financial resources to place a child in an undesirable care facility or arrangement.

SUMMARY OF S. 4, THE PROPOSED CHILD CARE ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

Mr. President, for the benefit of my colleagues, I will describe the provisions of our bill.

Section 1 would establish the short title of the bill as the Child Care Assistance Act of 1985.

Section 2 would set forth the findings and purposes of the act. The findings pertain to the extent of the need for child-care services. The purposes of the act are to provide assistance to the States in improving the quality of and coordination among child-care services; to provide mechanisms for assessing the extent of the need for child-care services in the Nation; to promote at all governmental levels coordination of child-care programs and other services for children and their families; to promote the availability and diversity of quality child-care services for all children and families who need such services; to provide assistance to families whose financial resources are insufficient to pay the full cost of necessary child-care services; and to strengthen the functioning of families by seeking to ensure that parents are not forced by lack of available programs or of financial resources to place a child in an undesirable care facility or arrangement.

Section 3 would direct that nothing in the act be construed to authorize any public agency or private organization or any individual associated therewith to interfere with, or to intervene in, any child-rearing decision of parents. The purpose of this legislation is to help parents who need financial or other assistance to secure the child care they want for their children—not to diminish or interfere with the rights of parents.

Section 4 would provide for State participation under the act through the submission to the Secretary of Health and Human Services of a State plan providing for the specification of a State agency to be responsible for administration and oversight of a State plan designed to meet the need for child-care services within the State for preschool children and school-age children of working parents, with special attention to meeting the need for services of migrant children, disabled children, children with limited English-language proficiency, and other groups of children having special needs. The term "preschool" is used broadly to encompass children under the age of 6, including infants. Similarly, the term "disabled" is not intended to be limited to children who have been formally classified as such but rather to focus broadly upon the special needs of some children.

This State plan would provide the basic framework within each State for assessing child-care needs and for developing a plan for meeting those needs. Each State would have substantial flexibility to design the plan to meet its own particular needs within the parameters set by the act. The State agency specified under the plan would also be responsible for coordinating, to the maximum extent feasible, the provision of services under this act with other child-care programs and services assisted under other State of Federal laws and with other appropriate services, including health, nutrition, and social services, available to such children under other Federal and State programs.

In response to suggestions made by several witnesses at our 1979 hearings, section 4(a)(1) specifies that the State agency designated to administer the program should be an "appropriate" agency with the capacity to carry out programs. Such an agency should have an appropriate mission in terms of the welfare of children.

Section 4(a)(3)(A)(i) would provide that funds be distributed within the State, in accordance with the plan developed, to child care providers that are licensed or otherwise in compliance with State laws and meet the quality standards developed by the Secretary for all child-care programs receiving Federal funds under this proposed act and for such other HHS-funded programs as the Secretary may specify. In this 1985 version of S. 4, this provision is modified to provide that the Secretary may specify other HHS-funded child-care programs to be covered by these new standards. The original S. 4 referred only to "licensed" providers that meet the standards established under the act. Various witnesses pointed out that in some States procedures other than licensing are used to regulate child-care providers. For example in certain States, registration programs are used for some family day-care providers. The original language was modified to clarify that programs and providers that are in compliance with applicable State laws are eligible for participation. All providers, however, would also be subject to the second requirement—section 4(a)(3)(A)(ii)—of meeting the quality standards applicable to programs funded under the act.

Section 4(a)(3)(b) would require States to distribute the funds by grants to or contracts with eligible child-care providers or, on a demonstration project basis, through alternative payment mechanisms. This limitation of alternative payment mechanisms to only demonstration projects is in response to the concerns expressed by some witnesses that some restrictions should be placed upon alternative payment mechanism approaches until thorough evaluations of their effectiveness have been completed. At the same time, other witnesses expressed support for the notion of developing innovative types of programs that would further enhance parental choices.

Various alternative payment programs have been developed in several States. For example, in California alternative payment programs were created under the State's 1978 alternative child-care legislation, commonly referred to as the AB 3059 Program. Nineteen programs were established under this legislation. These programs act primarily as administrative mechanisms to pay for subsidized child care for eligible families; they do not generally provide child care directly. Payment are made either to the child-care providers under a vendor program or to the parents themselves under a voucher program. In a number of cases, the vendor/voucher program operates as part of an information and referral program. Assessment of these programs has been very favorable. Similar types of programs have also been established in Florida. The Community Coordinated Child Care for Central Florida Program is an example of a very effective alternative payment program. In 1979, 3,000 childen were receiving assistance under this program.

However, in both California and Florida, these alternative payment programs are operated in conjunction with other services and safeguards to ensure that quality child care is provided. These approaches might not be feasible in other areas, particularly where an inadequate supply of child care exists or where adequate safeguards are not in place to protect against misuse. Thus, the new provisions limit utilization of alternative payment mechanisms to demonstration projects established under guidelines issued by the Secretary. Those guidelines would be focused upon ensuring the quality of care and safeguards as well as evaluation of the effectiveness of these programs.

Section 4 contains another modification from the version of S. 4 first introduced in 1979 to make it clear that a State could choose, in the development of its plan for expenditure of the funds under the act, to transfer a portion of funds to an umbrella-type organization—either public or private nonprofit—to distribute funds to child-care providers within a particular community. For example, a State might passthrough funds to a city or county or a local nonprofit entity rather than deal directly with child-care providers.

Section 4(a)(3)(C)(i) would provide that priority for receipt of funds be given to child-care providers that provide priority for services for children on the basis of child and family need, taking into account factors such as family income, family size, and the special needs of children from households with a single parent, with particular emphasis on the provision of child-care services to families where lack of child care is or would be a barrier to the continuation or commencement of employment. Under this provision, the need of a child for continuity of care, for example, could be a factor in determining priority for services. As part of the overall focus of S. 4 upon meeting employment-related child-care needs, emphasis is placed upon services to families where lack of such services would be an obstacle to continued employment or attainment of employment.

Section 4(a)(3)(C)(ii) would provide that priority in the distribution of funds within a State be given to child-care providers that, to the maximum extent feasible, provide for an economic mix of children enrolled in the program. This provision, coupled with a requirement in section 4(a)(5) for the establishment of a sliding fee scale, based upon the services provided and family income adjusted for family size, is designed to promote programs which encourage an economic mix as well as avoid the problems that occur presently when a family loses its assistance if a parent gets a raise or promotion. During our earlier hearings, we heard witnesses describe how parents were dropped from programs when their income rose slightly. A sliding fee scale which provides for an increase in family contributions as income rises is a far preferable approach.

Section 4(4)(a) would give the State agency the responsibility of making sure that funds will be distributed, to the maximum extent feasible, to a variety of child-care providers, including but not limited to child-care centers and family day-care providers. In other words, parental choice should not be limited to a particular type of care. A diversity of providers is a key factor in promoting real parental choices.

Section 4(a)(4)(B) would give a priority in the distribution of funds to community-based programs which provide meaningful opportunities for parental involvement. The issue of whether only nonprofit providers should be eligible for receipt of public funds has been a difficult issue which has often divided the child-care community. On the one hand, some argue that allowing proprietary child-care programs to receive funds to provide services to eligible families would invite substantial problems. On the other hand, many argue that limiting participation, for example, only to nonprofit or public agencies, would restrict parental choice. Indeed, proprietary child-care programs now are major providers of child care in this country, and excluding them from participation would substantially limit the freedom of a parent to choose the particular program that the parent feels is best for his or her child. On balance, such an exclusion would undermine the fundamental philosophy underlying S. 4—that we should be assisting parents in securing child-care services and increasing their choices, not limiting them to a particular program. The most effective ways of ensuring that all providers—nonprofit and public as well as proprietary—provide quality care for children is to establish uniform standards applicable to all programs which seek such funds and to make reliable information about competing programs available to inquiring parents.

At the same time, I recognize the concerns expressed by those who fear that syndicated profit-making programs make seek to dominate the program. Our modification of section 4 to provide a priority for funding of community-based programs—which could include local proprietary entities—with meaningful opportunities for parental involvement is designed to target limited funds toward those programs most likely to involve parents actively in the actual operation of the program, while still allowing other programs the opportunity to participate.

Section 4(a)(6) would further provide that the State's plan include provisions for the establishment of procedures for data collection to show how the child-care needs of the State are being met by programs assisted under the act, and the degree of unmet child-care needs within the State.

Section 4(a)(7) would specifically provide that the State plan must include a provision for the establishment or support by grants to or contracts with public or private nonprofit entities, of information-and-referral services. These provisions have been expanded to stress the fact that these programs not only help parents in locating child care, but also that they perform a host of other functions ranging from technical assistance and training services for existing child-care providers to needs-assessment information for potential child-care providers. These provisions for information-and-referral programs, or resource-and-referral as they are sometimes called, are a particularly important part of S. 4. I am proud to say that California has been a national leader in the establishment of and support for information-and-referral programs. These programs have overwhelmingly demonstrated their effectiveness in dealing with a number of problems in the child-care area.

Mr. President, we did make some progress during the 98th Congress with regard to Federal support for information-and-referral programs with the enactment of section 109 of Public Law 98-558, the Human Services Reauthorization Act. Section 109 authorized the establishment of a grant program to the States for planning and development of dependent care programs. Although child-care resource-and-referral systems are eligible for grants under this new program, funds are limited to startup or planning costs and cannot be used to provide for ongoing operating expenses. In contrast, S. 4 would provide for grants to support the actual operation of these type of programs which are of such importance to parents searching for good quality child care.

Similarly, funds are available under the new program to help with the costs of planning and establishing programs for school-aged children. They are not available, however, to help such programs actually provide child-care services.

Moreover, the total authorization of appropriations for the new program is $20 million for each of fiscal years 1985 and 1986, and the types of groups covered by resource-and-referral systems include elderly and disabled individuals, not just children in need of child-care services. Thus, although I strongly supported the legislation which had been introduced in the Senate during the last Congress dealing with the need for school-aged child care and providing for support for child-care information-and-referral programs, the legislation that was ultimately enacted fell short of what is truly needed in these areas.

Provisions are also included in sections 4(a)(8), (9), (10), and (11) of S. 4 to require the State plan to provide for the training of child-care personnel, for the development and implementation of State licensing or regulation of child-care providers, for the establishment of procedures for meaningful parental involvement in State and local planning, and for the monitoring and evaluation of programs and services provided under the act, and to require certain assurances that funds received under the act will be used to supplement, and not supplant, existing Federal funds used for the support of child-care services and related programs. For each fiscal year, the State would be limited to using no more than 10 percent of its funding for administration of the program.

Section 4(b) would provide, as part of the State plan requirements, for the establishment of a State advisory panel on child care. At least one-third of the members of the panel would be parents of children who are receiving or have recently received child-care services of the types supported under the act. Another one-third would be representatives of different types of child-care providers and individuals who are professionals in the field of child development or related fields.

The State advisory panel would be responsible for advising the State agency on the preparation of, and policy matters arising in the administration of, the State plan, and for the review and evaluation of child-care programs and services provided under the act and other provisions of law, and would be authorized to prepare and submit, through the State agency, recommendations to the Secretary. Sufficient funds would be required to be made available under the State plan for the State advisory panel to carry out its functions, to obtain the services of such professional, technical, and clerical personnel as necessary, and to pay the reasonable expenses—as determined in accordance with guidelines prescribed by the Secretary—of panel members while carrying out their duties.

Section 4(c) would provide for the Secretary to approve any State plan which meets the requirements set forth in the act, and provide that the Secretary may not disapprove any State plan, except after reasonable notice, an opportunity to correct deficiencies in the plan, and notice of an opportunity for a hearing on the grounds for the disapproval.

Section 4(d) would provide that the specified State agency be required to provide the Secretary with a concise report on an annual basis describing activities, results, and performance of the State agency in meeting the objectives of the State plan and the purpose of the act.

Section 5 relates to the national administration of the act. The Secretary would be directed to designate an identifiable administrative unit within HHS and an individual within that administrative unit to be responsible for carrying out the provisions of this act, for coordination of other activities within HHS relating to child care, and for seeking to coordinate pertinent HHS child-care-related activities with those of other Federal departments and agencies. The Secretary would also be directed to make available to such unit such staff and resources as are necessary for it to carry out effectively its functions under the act.

Section 5 also would provide for the establishment of a National Advisory Panel on Child Care Needs and Services, of which not less than one-third of the members must be parents of children who are receiving or have recently received child-care services of the type supported under the act and not less than one-third must be representatives of child-care providers, including representatives of different types of child-care programs and individuals who are professionals in the field of child development and related fields. One-third of the members serving on the National Advisory Panel would be required to be individuals who are serving on, or have served on, a State advisory panel established under the act.

The National Advisory Panel would be made responsible for reviewing Federal policies with respect to child-care services and advising the Secretary with respect to the standards developed for programs receiving assistance under the act.

Section 5 further would provide that the Secretary, after consulting with the National Advisory Panel, and not later than 12 months after the date of enactment of the act, shall prepare proposed standards to be applied to programs receiving assistance under the act and such other HHS-funded child-care programs as the Secretary may specify. The proposed standards would cover factors having a demonstrated impact on the quality of child care, including, but not limited to, such factors as group size and composition in terms of the numbers of teachers and the number and ages of children, the qualifications of the child-care providers, and the physical environment, parental involvement, and necessary support services—including but not limited to health, nutrition, and social services—for child-care programs. These standards would be published in the Federal Register for public comment and distributed to each State advisory panel and State agency designated or established under the act.

Mr. President, extensive work has already gone into the development of standards for federally-supported child-care programs, and it is anticipated that the Panel would utilize these materials.

Section 6 would provide authority to the Secretary to make direct grants to or contracts with public and private organizations for the support of innovative child-care demonstration projects in such areas as night-time care and care for sick children, migrant children, disabled children, children with limited English-language proficiency, or other special needs populations. Project funded under this section would have to have an evaluation component, and the Secretary would be required to establish regulations to carry out these provisions not later than 6 months after the date of enactment.

Section 7 would provide that States receiving assistance under the act shall submit to the Secretary every 2 years a report outlining the current status of child-care licensing or regulation within the State, the deficiencies, if any, in the existing licensing or regulating program, a plan by the State to expand its licensing or regulating program, and the types of assistance the State requires in order to make improvements in its licensing or regulating program. The Secretary would be authorized to make grants to States for the purpose of developing, improving, or implementing child-care licensing or regulating programs. Also, the Secretary, after consulting with the National Advisory Panel, would be mandated to develop a Model State Licensing or Regulating of Child Care Providers Act, to be used by the States as a guide to improving licensing or regulating of child-care providers, and to publish it in the Federal Register not later than 18 months after the date of enactment.

Again, in each of the provisions the word "regulation" or "regulating" has been added in recognition of the fact that some States may use other terms or systems for certain types of child care.

Section 8 would authorize the Secretary to make grants to and enter into contracts with institutions of higher education, State and local public agencies, and private organizations to provide training programs for child-care providers and employees. The Secretary would also be authorized to provide technical assistance to the States in the planning, developing, and coordinating of child-care services, in the developing, expanding, and implementing of State licensing or regulating of child-care programs, and in developing and conducting teacher or child-care-provider training programs.

Section 9 would provide for an allotment of 1 percent of the total sums appropriated to be made available to Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Northern Marina Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. The remainder of the sums appropriated would be allocated among the States based, with even weight, upon, first, each State's relative proportion of children living in homes where both parents are employed or seeking employment or where the child resides with only one parent and that parent is employed or seeking employment and, second, the State's relative proportion of children who reside in households having incomes which are equal to or less than one-half of the median income of the United States for families of the same size. Section 9 also provides for reallotment of any State's allotment which is not utilized.

Section 10 would provide for the Secretary to make payments to each State having a plan approved under section 4 in the amount allotted under section 9, and provide that payments under the act may be made in installments, in advance, or by way of reimbursement, with necessary adjustments on account of overpayments or underpayments.

Section 11 would authorize the Secretary, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing, to withhold payments to any State where there has been a substantial failure to comply with any provision or any requirement set forth in the State plan or with any applicable provision of the act. In the case of noncompliance by a particular program or project, further payments would be authorized to be limited to programs or projects under the State plan, or portions thereof, that are not affected by such noncompliance.

Section 12 would direct the Secretary to carry out reviews and evaluations of the programs and activities carried out under the act and conduct studies on child care needs for the purpose of providing information aimed at achieving the following purposes:

Enabling the Congress and the executive branch to seek to reach agreement upon specific, realistic objectives and expectations for programs and activities under the act;

Assuring that programs and activities established and carried out under the act at the Federal, State, and local levels are likely to achieve progress toward such objectives and expectations;

Obtaining sufficient data to measure progress under the act and making those data available to the Congress and the executive branch; and

Enabling Congress and the executive branch to better understand the child care needs of the Nation and how best to meet those needs in a cost-effective fashion.

In carrying out these functions, the Secretary would be directed to consult with appropriate committees of the Congress and members of the executive branch, to examine representative samples of actual programs, to indentify or develop cost-effective programs, and to determine how the results of such reviews and evaluations can best be disseminated and utilized to achieve the purposes described. Also the Secretary would be directed to prepare and transmit to the President and the Congress every 2 years on or before March 1 a concise report of activities and progress under the act.

Mr. President, the evaluation and oversight provisions of this bill were originally developed in close consultation with the General Accounting Office. In 1978, the Comptroller General released a report with respect to improving congressional oversight efforts. That report outlined a process for planning and carrying out congressional oversight programs. GAO staff provided great assistance to us in designing and drafting these provisions, and I am deeply appreciative of their efforts to assist us in building effective monitoring mechanisms into our legislative efforts.

Section 13 would set forth definitions of the various terms utilized in the act. A "child" is defined as any individual who has not attained the age of 15 except that with respect to eligibility for services, the definition of "child" may include a disabled individual who has not yet attained the age of 18. A "parent" includes any natural parent, foster parent, or legal guardian with whom the child resides.

Section 14 would, subject to two express limitations which I will describe, authorize appropriations to carry out the provisions of the act of $200 million for fiscal year 1984 and such sums as may be necessary for each of the four succeeding fiscal years. Of the sums appropriated for any fiscal year, 75 percent would be earmarked for grants under section 4, relating to grants for carrying out the State plan; 5 percent for making grants under section 6, relating to demonstration projects; 5 percent for making grants under section 7, relating to licensing or regulating assistance; 5 percent for making grants or contracts under section 8(a), relating to training programs; and 10 percent for carrying out sections 5, 8(b), and 12, relating to national administration—including the reasonable expenses of the National Advisory Panel on Child Care Needs and Services—and training and technical assistance.

Mr. President, the level of authorization of appropriations for the first year—$200 million—represents the amount which had been available prior to fiscal year 1982 at the 100-percent Federal funding for child care services provided under title XX. It would thus represent simply a restoration of funding which was lost as a result of the Reagan administration's budget reductions. In subsequent years, appropriations would presumably be increased at reasonable rates consistent with the availability of Federal resources and national needs.

Mr. President, let me stress that this bill is not intended to meet the entire need for assistance in the child care area. Rather, S. 4 would simply provide the framework for a modest and measured increase in support for those families with the greatest needs. In addition, built into the legislation are provisions for the collection of data to assess the extent to which additional funds are needed. Increases in future appropriations would be related to the evaluation of this information and assessments of effectiveness of the expenditures of the funds already appropriated.

Section 14 contains two express limitations on the authorization of appropriations. First, subsection (b)(1) would provide that no funds would be authorized to be appropriated for any fiscal years unless funds appropriated for the preceding fiscal year to carry out part A of title V of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, relating to the Head Start Program, are at least equal to the funds appropriated for that program for fiscal year 1985—approximately $1 billion.

Second, section 14(b)(2) contains a provision which relates specifically to the current problem of massive Federal deficits. Although I do not believe that we should bring to a halt all of our efforts to deal with pressing national problems—like child care—I am acutely aware of the need to bring down the growing Federal deficits.

Since I do not wish to submit any proposal that would be inconsistent with efforts to develop a fiscal year 1986 budget premised on a Governmentwide freeze concept, I have added a provision to S. 4—as well as to the authorization of appropriations for a new pilot demonstration program of noninstitutional treatment approaches for veterans, included in S. 6, which was also introduced on January 3—which would provide that in the event that a first concurrent budget resolution is adopted by the Congress for fiscal year 1986 which is based on a comprehensive freeze in Government spending or incorporates a fiscal 1986 spending level no greater than the total of fiscal year 1985 outlays plus any cost-of-living increases provided for entitlement payments and increases due to increased interest payments on the national debt, then no funds would be authorized to be appropriated for this new program in fiscal year 1986.
